SPRING IS HERE!

—Start your Spring "boost" campaign with a feature that costs a little more but IS A LITTLE BETTER.

—It's "CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S WARD" a "Thanhouser BIG Production," four reels, James Cruze and Flo La Badie featured. Renting now.

—Better run "Thanhouser BIG Productions" clear through Spring and even through the heated spell. Better make your theatre the attended theatre ALL THE TIME! Better see that nearest Continental or Mutual office for the attractive arrangement that gives you for exclusive first-run use for a full-year in your locality. Absolute protection is yours under this system. No more advertising a feature heavily to learn the fellow down the street is going to get it, too. All in four reels and all BIG in story, cast and settings.

"Thanhouser 'BIG' Productions"

THE THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK

Sunday, March 29—"WHEN SORROW FADES" is a story of high life and slum that features a little settlement-worker, played by Mignon Anderson. There is a regular beauty array in this picture—Mignon, Fan Bourke and Lila Hayward Chester, the New York Times' Prettiest Girl. Handsome Harry Benham, in the leading male role, contributes more "looks," and Eric Jewett and Ed Walton are in his support.

Tuesday, March 21—"REPENTANCE," TWO REELS, is one of the type of "lesson" plays that made the name of Thanhouser famous. The "punch" in this play is simply terrific! The noted foreign actor, William Glickman, heads the cast—his first appearance in a moving picture—and with him are "Miss Beautiful," the mystery of the movies; John Rhinehart—in a DUAL role—Frank Farrington, Nan Bernard and May Dunne.

In the dregs

"The Redemption of David Corson," the noted story of a man's desperate struggle with himself, provides William Farnum with a role superbly suited to his individuality. David Corson is a rugged man with an abundance of magnetism and spiritual power. For a time he uses his psychic gifts to rescue and redeem his stumbling fellow-men; until a woman comes into his life—and Satan comes also. From this time David degrades his great power by using it as a means to secure the woman. He loses his great faith, gambles and drinks, and narrowly escapes becoming a murderer. Then, after an agonizing period of anguish and remorse, he emerges from the shadow of shame and sin, and achieves his regeneration.

"PREFERRED FEATURE ATTRACTIONS"

A Splendid Subject, Splendidly Presented

After an introductory which fairly bristles with action and the joy of living, the plot swerves by gradual stages up to the supreme test imposed upon a devoted wife whose husband has become a hopeless cripple by reason of a fall from his horse. The sufferer pleads for the means with which to end his agony and the wife, overwhelmed by conflicting emotions, hands him this medium and steels herself for the ordeal which follows. Man-made laws place her on trial for her life and the denouement is one of great power.

"Our MUTUAL Girl" MEETS BLANCHE RING

No girl ever had a greater variety of experience than that busiest of all young people in New York.

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

In the eleventh issue of this incomparable picture series Margaret, who has been to see Blanche Ring in "When Claudia Smiles" at the Lyric Theatre, becomes so enthusiastic about this musical hit that she pleads with her Aunt for permission to go on the Stage herself. Of course, her Aunt refuses, much to the disappointment of who, determined to have her own way at any cost, starts out to find a position. She applies to a well-known manager with such success that she is actually rehearsing with a ballet when her Aunt finds her. Then she has to go back home and is put to bed.

Remember that none of these things would have happened if Margaret hadn't had the good fortune to be introduced to who is shown on the Screen in two of the Best Scenes of her Production.

EASTER IS COMING SOON, and the part of this reel which is NOT devoted to Margaret's experience trying to "go on the stage," shows this young devotee of fashion at one of the most famous Fifth Avenue Millinery Shops. She has a number of hats sent to her Aunt's house and tries them all on—which is shown distinctly and in the utmost detail. These hats are certainly enough to make her the envy of half of the women in America.

Don't Forget That the Greatest Modern Historical Picture, is Nearing Completion and is Going to Be the Most Important Feature of this Nature Ever Exhibited.

THE LIFE of GENERAL VILLA,

Also don't fail to remember this list of those Mutual brands which are sure to make your programme stronger than that of any of your competitors:

Facts and Comments

TOWARD the end of our legislative sessions at Albany, when everybody knows that it is too late to pass a bill, a flood of fool measures is pouring down upon the speaker's desk. We would have been disappointed if the motion picture theater had been left out in this annual crop of legislative folly. Among the measures relating specially to motion pictures is one providing for the appointment of a commission with jurisdiction over the entire state. It is really a censorship scheme in thin disguise. We suppose the disguise was thought necessary in view of the odium which the late Mayor Gaynor has brought upon the word censorship in this state. Thanks to his vigorous and intelligent action, the spectre of censorship in this state will not emerge from the shadows in many a year.

ONE of the signs of the great progress in quality is the disposition of the public to expect high standards from the film producer who engages in the filming of a classic or biblical subject. It has taken years to reach the higher standards in the treatment of great subjects, and it is the plain duty of the journals devoted to motion pictures to maintain these standards and to protest against any lowering of them. What might have been tolerated five years ago has become impossible to-day. Not only the critics, but the public, have become far more discriminating, and an inferior picture leaning on a famous name or subject is a positive injury to the new reputation of the motion picture art. Nor will unconscionable "puffing" help in the least. You cannot "puff" merit into a picture which does not really possess it. The enthusiasm of the press agent is always pardonable and always harmless, because the public will freely use the grains of salt "in such case made and provided." The press agent owes responsibility only to his employer, while the journal with a conscience owes a duty to all its readers.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD enjoys the implicit confidence of its readers because every reader knows that it is not only fair but when occasion demands it, fearless. With every disposition to encourage the producer, whose money and enterprise and art are essential to the life and prosperity of the industry, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will never hesitate to point out what is faulty and inferior. It need not be emphasized to our readers that all criticism is intended to be constructively useful to the producer as well as profitable to the exhibitor. Any other kind of criticism is utter waste of words. The reader of this paper has the right to expect honest and truthful reports of all the work turned out by the producer, even if on occasion it becomes necessary to make Inferiority wince and Mediocrity to go into mourning.

THE School of Journalism is thought by many newspaper men to be an impossible fad, but there is one exercise lately adopted in that school which will be commended even by those who believe that newspaper men are born, not made. We refer to the intelligent use of the motion picture in connection with a course in reporting. Two or three reels of motion pictures showing real warfare are thrown upon the screen, and the budding reporters are asked to watch the action and then write out their reports of what they have seen. When the writer was a young man the description of gorgeously dressed show-windows was considered a suitable exercise for the youthful reportorial fancy, but the motion picture is much more likely to lick the "cub" into shape. There was no action in the show-window.

ORGANIZED exhibitors everywhere ought to fight the men who for the sake of a little money, or often for the sake of the pleasure of anticipating it, are willing to subject the reputable men in the profession to stigma and reproach. We call attention to a typical case in the neighboring city of Hoboken. Like the rest of the country, this thriving town had greatly increased both the quality and the quantity of its moving picture theaters within the last year or two. The personnel of the men in the profession had improved, their shows were unmolested by the authorities. Now comes one man, a stranger alike to the feelings of decency and fraternity and displays "white-slave" films after offensively advertising them. At once there is trouble. The Mayor very properly thinks his oath of office means something, and he sets about to stop the nuisance. Not familiar with conditions, he proposes censorship, thus endangering investments figuring into the hundreds of thousands. The danger is averted for the moment, but what about the man who either recklessly or willfully tried to wreck the business of his fellows? Can nothing be done by the organized exhibitors to eliminate him from the ranks of the profession?

A Solemn Joke?

By W. Stephen Bush

AT a time when all the great constitutional issues involved in the attempted censorship legislation of the State of Ohio are being considered by three Federal judges in the Northern District of Ohio a most curious "National censorship bill" is introduced in the Senate of the United States by Hoke Smith, one of the senators from Georgia. It is introduced "by request," which means that the introducer does not want to be blamed personally for what he has done. The Senator says in an interview that he is anxious "that the people all over the country should know just what is in the bill." He also hopes that "publicity will give the bill the benefits of criticism."

One does not have to read much between these lines to get at the true inwardness of it all. Senator Smith, who, as a member of one of the Cleveland cabinets, has acquired a reputation as a solemn political wag, has probably been importuned by the censorship "cranks" all over the country to help them, and he, consequently, introduced the bill, thus getting rid of the individual and collective reformers who have been dinning things into his senatorial ears.

It is impossible to look upon this bill and not laugh at it.

Nevertheless there is a serious, aye, almost a sad and sombre aspect of the whole situation. The introduction of the bill reveals the scandalous fact that there are many thousands, perhaps millions, of Americans who do not know the first principles of the fundamental laws of the land in which they and their ancestors have been living. Let us for the moment waive the question of the legality of official censorship in the states. Let us for the sake of argument—and only for the sake of argument—assume that the states may exercise the right of censorship over motion pictures. It is absolutely certain that the Congress of the United States has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter at all. It is well-known to every schoolboy who has passed his Regents Examination in Civics that the United States has only such powers as the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of the United States confer upon it. These powers are carefully and specifically enumerated in the Articles of Confederation and in the Federal Constitution.

Article X of the latter instrument declares: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution . . . are reserved to the states. . . ." We make no apology for advising the strange human beings who still talk in all seriousness about a "national censorship" to either buy or borrow a copy of the United States Constitution and read it through, not once but several times. They will look in vain for any power conferred on the United States permitting the Congress of the United States to deal with censorship or regulation of motion pictures in any way whatever. The obvious fact that motion pictures were unknown in 1788 ought to make this discovery easy enough. There is no power in the Congress of the United States which by analogy might be construed into a Federal power over motion pictures. In other words, there is far more substance in the beams of the moon than in all this talk of official national censorship.

As exclusively announced in The Moving Picture World at the time, Congress put a censorship clause in the new tariff law. The power to censor certain motion picture films is vested in the Treasury Department and is confined to pictures made abroad and imported from abroad. We believe that this provision of the new tariff law is of doubtful constitutionality, but there is at least a shadow and a semblance of reason for it, for the power of Congress over importations and customs is clear. It is a well-known fact that the Treasury Department looks upon this censoring clause as a dead letter. It is optional with the Treasury Department to enforce this clause or to ignore it. Up to the present time no effort has been made to enforce it or to take it seriously. No set of rules and regulations have ever been prepared to carry it into effect. The fact of the matter is that the Treasury Department has been advised in an informal way of the absurdity of this censorship clause which was inserted into the new tariff law, not by a legislator, but by the chaplain of the United States, a pious man, no doubt, but a man with no legal or legislative experience.

To us it is perfectly incomprehensible that the advocates of censorship for motion pictures cannot see that its evils cannot be abated by making the censorship national in scope. A national censorship, even if such a thing were legally feasible, would by no means abolish state censorship. The states would exercise their censorships concurrently with the Federal government just as the liquor traffic to-day is subject both to state and to Federal regulation.

Sooner or later the sanity of American statesmanship and the validity of the fundamental law must be vindicated. The litigation now pending in Ohio must soon come to a decision. The facts and the law in that case were submitted to the U. S. District Court of the Northern District of Ohio in November of last year. Whatever the decision may be, it is bound to be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The great question of whether the motion picture is to be enfranchised and put in one and the same category with the press as a medium of free and untrammeled expression cannot be ultimately adjudicated anywhere but in the highest court of the land.

Congress has forbidden the transportation from one state into another of films depicting prize-fights. We have always pointed out that while we are in sympathy with the suppression of such films we are altogether doubtful of the legality of the measure. Congress bases its action on the prize-fight films on its delegated power to regulate commerce between the states. It does not censor the film nor even attempt to censor it. Congress summarily forbids its transportation from one state to another. Even if we are prepared to admit that Congress had the power to do this it does by no means follow by any method of analogy that censoring motion pictures generally is one of the powers that Congress possesses as the regulator of interstate commerce.

Why not wait with any further agitation or action for the establishment of official censorship until the Court which is now deliberating on the arguments submitted has rendered its decision? Such a course would be common sense and good law at the same time. No earthly good can be accomplished by the foolish and arbitrary meddling by local authorities. The industry is sufficiently strong, at any rate, to be intrusted with its own regulation for the few days which will probably elapse before the announcement of the judicial decision. If the country has survived ten years of motion pictures without any great visible injury, it is likely to last a few weeks longer.

Only a Story

By Louis Reeves Harrison

FAR away, down in the valley, can be seen the figure of a woman all in white. She is coming straight up, sometimes hidden by slight undulation of ground and tall grass, but never wavering from her course, even to notice flowers that watch her in silent envy. There is an expectant look on her face as she approaches; it is radiant with promise of a smile; her eyes shine as she glances to the right and to the left of her, then she stops and lays one hand on her panting bosom and closes her eyes. Is she weary, or has a sudden thought affected her, a premonition that there is to be failure in what she has counted upon?

Now that she is near, it is seen that she is young—her face has the sweetness of inexperience,—that she is at the dawn of womanhood, yet there is an elegance about her, in the drapery of her costume, in her poise and grace of movement, that indicates a high social position. There is simplicity in her elegance—she wears no jewelry, not even a ring, and her costly gown is cunningly devised to harmonize with her youth. She is an exquisite product of rare cultivation. She opens her eyes, sighs deeply, bites her nether lip in impatience over her faint-heartedness and forces a smile. She is taking on new courage. "After all, it is only a question of waiting."

She waits a little, then a mystified expression creeps into her face. A frown of perplexity settles between her brows, and she glances about her with alarmed suspicion. Some one is near. She feels it, and shrinks back as if suddenly paralyzed with fear. "What is that movement in the grass?" She gazes with open-eyed horror at the spot, then her fears are superseded by curiosity. She advances and kneels down, her features relaxing with pity and softening with natural affection. She spreads the grass apart, and——

Such is the opening note of an intense drama, whose general scheme Yorick of Six Plots could not come within six hundred plots of guessing, but the point is whether the best of directors would similarly interpret a scenario reading, "Scene I. Dorothy seen climbing hill, looks about her, kneels down in grass, and——" After reading the detailed action and characterization herein given, the director might use an ordinary sketch as a reminder of what was already well pictured in his mind, but could not the rough sketch alone be subject to many interpretations, none of which would approach the author's conception?

I am only asking a question—I leave bare assertion to those who know all about it, and their name is legion. The whole art of photodrama production, from the original scenario, through the intricacies of staging, selecting types, insisting on appropriate costumes, directing the action, photographing the scenes, developing, toning, tinting, printing and editing, is a fascinating study in each and every department. It is all worth discussion, all worthy of the light of intelligent opinion, no matter how varied, so I occasionally raise a question without attempting to give the answer. Should not an author picture his story so that his full conception is made clear, or should he leave nearly all that is calculated to stimulate imagination to guesswork?

It is said that this question is difficult to decide because such a flood of manuscripts are sent to the studios, of which not one in a hundred is worth while. May I inquire, in purest simplicity of heart, why scenarios obviously not worth while are examined at all? Is it that their worthlessness is not obvious? I hope it is not unreasonable to compare a scenario to a plan of a house that is to be built. If you were about to build a house costing tens of thousands, or merely thousands, would you seek plans from those who know their business, or would you devote your valuable time to studying designs obviously drawn by those who know nothing about the business?

Would you ask a professional architect, one accustomed to give care, time, study, concentration upon a balance between good taste and practical utility in his drawings, to stunt all that afforded evidence of their value so that you could have more time to examine the obviously worthless? Is it not pretty nearly time for you to measure up to the publisher, or the editor, in recognizing craftsmanship at a glance? Even if an architect were able to picture the house he is to build by glancing at a penciled outline, could he give you a clear idea of the completed structure in that way? Do not the builders of successful structures of any kind require plans worked out in complete and thorough shape?

I am only asking questions. Is it not true that a split-reel farce comedy is the kind of a shack that can be built on scant framework, and that, as the drama rises in size and importance, the working plans require greater pains and attention to detail if the costly structure is to command general admiration? Is it not common experience that the greatest and the most beautiful edifices are well conceived in the mind of man before materialization is attempted? Is not the patched-up house that requires constant changing the least profitable in the end? Is it reasonable to expect, even, if the demand for features is in excess of the supply and permits the profitable sale of excrescences, that such a condition will always obtain?

A photoplay is only a story. That started at the beginning of this article was amplified a little more than necessary, but, even as it stands, it would only occupy about half of a letter page in single space, and it contains in story form a description of the setting, costume, type, characterization, emotional expression and actual movement in an opening scene of high importance. The director or the editor who reads it does not have to guess at its meaning as he goes along, with only one chance in a hundred that he will guess right. To the contrary, he is enabled to see the play as the author sees it and wishes the audience to see it.

If a photodrama is a structure that must be built up according to well-devised plans, those plans must naturally come from those competent to make them, and that is the trend of modern production. Producers are going to professional authors instead of to amateurs for their scenarios. I admit that professional authors have a lot to learn about this new art. One thing that few of them have ever though of is what might be called the "time scheme" of a big feature. A writer having expert knowledge of the question of time measurement in scenes and acts can greatly facilitate the director's labor and save quite an amount of money now wasted in taking more of each scene than is actually necessary.

But after an author has mastered all the technics of the new art, after he has succeeded in preserving the continuity of a hundred and fifty scenes in a five-reel feature and in establishing a condition of interest that will hold an audience motionless for two hours, he must remember that he must submerge all he has learned, even the purpose of what he is telling, for the finest photodrama ever shown on the screen is "only a story."

"The Perils of Pauline"

The New Eclectic Serial Carries Prizes Worth $25,000; But Is Good Enough To Stand Alone.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE motion picture serial has come to stay. Serial novels have long held a commanding position in the magazines; but one of the most popular of these has concluded that they are no longer popular and is offering a complete novel with short stories. No one will deny that this, from the reader's standpoint, is a wise move; for the serial in the magazine, especially the monthly, was, except in cases of "three decker" novels, only a business expedient to induce an even, dependable distribution. But, quite on the other hand, the requirements of an evening's entertainment in a motion picture theater that accents the mechanical difficulties of presenting long stories would have made the serial picture imperative. The modern spectator wants variety and won't stand being wearied. The serial picture is so vivid and the impression it leaves on one is so clear-cut that the period of waiting between installments is rather a pleasant experience than otherwise. This is going to work out distinctly for the good of the business; for the serial that isn't vivid and doesn't leave an impression deep enough to last over the gap, is going to be the sharpest kind of frost. The serial that doesn't "get over" had better not have been made. By the same token, the serial picture that does get over with a real punch is going to be a great money-maker. "The Perils of Pauline" seems, on this account, to this reviewer, an ideal offering for the exhibitor.

There are several things that contribute to its excellence as a show. There are big prizes offered to spectators clever enough to solve certain mysteries that come up in the progress of its story and we may add at once that these mysterious things are not, so far, in connection with the plot and we feel sure that they will not hamper the interest in the story at all. But even better than the $25,000 in prizes that are offered is the good quality of the entertainment. Only the first installment, the first three reels, has as yet been shown to us. We know nothing of the rest of the picture; but are sure that this part is good and when it closes we are, in our hearts, certain that Pauline, charmingly portrayed by Pearl White, is in real danger from the much trusted but very villainous secretary (Paul Panzer), of her foster father now dead. By the old man's will, the precious secretary will inherit, "if anything happens" to the heiress.

Miss White hasn't had so good a chance in a long while to show her art and she plays this picture's ingenuous heroine with the truly wonderful naturalness that she has so surely at her command. Perhaps she doesn't always hit square in the center of the effect she desires; but she does it so often that she continually commands the heart-interest of the audience. Mr. Panzer, in the villain's part, finds it his duty to intensify this. His work on the audience is, of course, through the heroine and in the playing that he is doing and will do, he stirs an anti-sympathy that is every bit as worthy of praise; for the audience takes it with the left hand, so to speak, and affectionately hands it back to the heroine with its right. Crane Wilbur, as the hero, has little chance in this beginning portion. The character is still colorless and we can hardly as yet criticise the player. The picture's weakest point is in its relief. The "comedy" gauchery of the outdoors man, a sort of gardner, but too much of a fool to tend a garden, is weak and not less so is the "fall" of the butler who is running out to the gate to help the gardner bring in the mummy box that comes to the house shortly before the heroine's foster father dies. The old man is drawn very well. He has now passed away and will not appear again—at least we presume so. The mummy, who comes to life while the old man dreams, is graceful and pleasing. There is also a very fair "tough" character in the story. All the characters, except, Miss White, are guilty, now and then, of over-registering their points.

The mechanical work is meritorious and we wish we could say that the photography, the prints, are perfectly clear and serviceable. That the thickness of the photographs in some of the scenes fails to hinder our comprehension of the story, speaks well for the simplicity and clearness of the script. At the opening of the double exposure scene in which the mummy comes to life, an awkward jump is noticeable; but the unsubstantial figure flits about the room in the best possible way and goes back to her mummy case again in so perfect a closing of the double exposure that the eye can detect no manipulation at all; it is done as naturally as dream.

The story has a story within a story; for Pauline is a budding writer and has got one of her novelettes accepted and printed by the Cosmopolitan Magazine and the old man, her foster father, reads it to us (in pictures) without wearying us at all. She doesn't want to get married to the hero for a year; she wants to see life first so that she can write things worth while. In the old man's will, her part of the fortune is left in charge of the secretary until she gets married. As the picture's first installment ends, it is clearly to her interest to elope with almost anyone; but what she really does do is left undecided as yet till the next of the series.

"Like Father Like Son" (American)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE two reel subject, "Like Father Like Son," by the American, presents an impressive lesson on the dangers of playing cards for money. It is an old maxim that the man who loses heavily at his first game, in any form of gambling, is highly favored by the gods; and that the man who wins at his first game will need a host of guardian angels thereafter to protect him from wrong doing.

The subject under review gives us an instance where a father serves a long term sentence for using his employer's money to meet his gambling debts; and where his son, over twenty years after, commits a similar crime, but is saved from the consequences.

Scene from "Like Father Like Son" (American).

Thomas Ricketts directed the making of these films, and he has been careful to keep in mind the after supervision of the censor. He has told the story strongly, without any reasonable risk of pruning by the censorial scissors.

The story does not demand from those who sustain the characters the exercise of any great display of photodramatic talent; but the greatest praise that can be given an actor is that he or she invests an ordinary character, amid ordinary surroundings, with its full natural force and artistic form. Edward Coxen, Miss Winnifred Greenwood and George Field have been assigned the principal parts, and all are to be commended for faithful depictions.

Scene from "Like Father Like Son" (American).

Miss Greenwood in the role of Mrs. Longley, the much tried wife and mother, excites our sympathy and wins our praise. Mr. Coxen and Mr. Field, in the parts of Ed. Longley and Paul Longley, the erring father and son of the story, also give well-drawn characterizations.

The disappearance of Ed. Longley from the path of his son's life, after he had saved him from shame and dishonor, is a most effective incident of the story. It convinces one of the thorough reformation of the convict, who, in order to spare his son the humiliation which a knowledge of the past would bring, passes out into the big, cold world to bear his crushing burden alone.

Edward Longley, the trusted cashier of a bank, and happy with his wife and Paul, his little son, listens to the repeated invitation of some of his friends and plays his first game of poker. He gets up from the table a winner and feels elated.

Six months later we find that he frequents a professional poker game and that he is always a loser. These professional sharpers soon get the whole fleece of the lamb, and afterwards secure his I. O. U. for a sum too large for him to meet with his own funds. Then they press him for payment and he takes the money from the big safe in the bank. Next morning the theft is discovered, and soon afterwards Ed. Longley occupies a felon's cell.

Mrs. Longley sells the little home and takes her boy, Paul, aged five, to another town far away to start life anew. Twenty years elapse and she is proud of her son, who has become cashier of the chief bank in the city.

Edward Longley has just been released from prison, where his conduct had been exemplary. He tries to find work, but always fails because of his lack of references. Then he chances to enter the city where his wife and Paul live. There, too, he fails to find anything but menial labor. One day, having induced the boss of a sweeping gang to employ him, he is run down by an auto driven by his son, Paul. The latter takes the injured man home where Mrs. Longley recognizes him. She immediately insists that his identity must be kept from Paul, who knows nothing of the past. Longley gladly assents, and is about to leave the premises when Paul returns to the room and insists that he shall be put under a doctor's care. When Longley recovers, he finds that Paul has secured for him the position of night watchman at the bank.

And now history repeats itself. Paul plays his first game of bridge whist at a fashionable gathering and wins. Soon, like his father before him, he plays with professional crooks and loses a large amount. The holder of his note demands payment, under threat of Paul's exposure to the president of the bank. Paul abstracts money from the bank's safe, but the night watchman, who has been fearful for his son's future, suspects the truth and during the night's rounds finds Paul's handkerchief beside the safe. He goes to Paul's home and delivers it to him. Paul is conscience-stricken and returns the money to the safe the same night.

The release date is April 6.

FLORENCE HACKETT.

FLORENCE HACKETT is another instance of what talent backed by brains and determination will accomplish. Two and a half years ago she was assigned by the Lubin management to Arthur Johnson's company. At first she supplied "atmosphere," played minor character parts and was always in readiness to undertake what a more important player would decline. Then "second" parts were regularly assigned to her, and gradually the motion picture public came to associate her with Mr. Johnson's photoplays. At this time she was given her first character lead and shortly afterward scored a series of successes in widely different roles in Mr. Johnson's two-reel productions. To-day Florence Hackett parts are written for the actress. Let it be said that "Florence Hackett parts" are any which demand exceptional emotional strength and the ability to efface the player's personality completely. She is convincing and satisfying either as a self-centered society girl or a grief-crazed fishwife.

Miss Hackett's hobby is the study of clothes—and the wearing of beautiful ones. She has original and entertaining theories regarding the science of dress and has embodied her ideas in several magazine articles.

"Tess of the Storm Country"

Miss Mary Pickford Appears in a Five-Part Famous Players Production That Will Make Wide Appeal.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

HERE is a story by a woman, of a woman, and for women—and for men, too. It makes a good picture, interesting throughout, and absorbingly so at times. That it will have wide and unusually popular appeal there is no doubt. "Tess of the Storm Country" possesses the qualities that make for success. There is an abundance of what is described as "heart interest," and strengthening and amplifying this most essential factor are not only big scenes but large groups well handled, situations in which many men and women are so impressed with the tragic happenings of which they are spectators that the concern revealed in their countenances makes them seem more like active participants. Two notable instances of these large groups are the court scenes and the dramatic christening of the fatherless and dying babe—at the altar of the church.

Of conflict of character there is much in these five reels. It is a contest between those who have little but content in primitive surroundings and those who have position and means and display no concern for the welfare of their humbler neighbors. Tessibel Skinner, a child of the seashore, unkempt in the early part of the story as she is ragged throughout it, is the natural leader of the fishermen-squatters in the shore huts. Against Tess and her people is Elder Elias Graves, stern, as cold-blooded as the fish he tries to prevent the squatters from catching, a man so thoroughly despicable as to be outside the pale of human sympathy.

As the interpreter of the part of Tess we have the always-charming Little Mary—it is doubtful if ever she will be to us a player by any other name. As she was in "Caprice," as she was in "Hearts Adrift." so she is in "Tess of the Storm Country"—inimitable, always doing the unexpected thing, yet always human, lovable; impulsive, her affections for her father as deep as her detestation of the elder for whose son there rises in her breast the first springs of love; religious, her faith in the God of whom she has learned from her theological student-lover as sure, as complete, as it is child-like and convincing. So, too, is she self-sacrificing, assuming without murmur of complaint the stigma of unwedded motherhood to save the reputation of the slowly declining sister of the man she loved as she was also the daughter of the man whose hand was always against Tess and her people.

Grace Miller White, the author of the book, laid the story by the shores of Cayuga Lake, which, on account of the fierceness of its squalls, is sometimes known as the "storm country." Producer Porter has staged his picture on the Pacific. He was most happy in his selection of backgrounds. A long row of fishermen's huts nestling on the beach at the foot of towering cliffs give the touch of realism when they are described to us as the homes of the squatters. It is in one of these that live Tess and her father. On the crest of the bluff in a great mansion resides Elder Graves, who when he finds he cannot legally evict his neighbors has enacted a law debarring them from the use of nets. It is Tess who urges on the fishermen to ignore the legislation. When one of the gamekeepers is fatally shot the evidence points to Daddy Skinner. He is tried and convicted.

Frederick Graves, who in the stormy conflicts between the contending factions has, while home on vacation, met and fallen in love with Tess, is visited by his chum, Dan Jordan. When the two young men return to school in the fall, Leola, the sister of Frederick, tries to muster courage to tell Dan, to whom she has become betrothed during the summer, a secret. She is handicapped by lack of a favorable opportunity. Some time after their departure, Leola writes a letter to Dan in which she confesses by implication her condition. Before she can mail it she receives word from her brother that Dan has perished in a fraternity house fire. It is Tess who shelters Leola when gray days fall.

Troubles multiply for the child-woman by the shore. She assumes the motherhood of the baby. Her father is in prison. The young man to whom she has looked up discovers the presence of the infant and spurns her. She is forced to combat the attentions of two "admirers," uncouth men of the fishing village. The Bible, which Tess had, in her own descriptive phrase, "cribbed" from the Mission having been destroyed by Frederick, she has nothing left but her God and the friendship of the failing woman for whom she has sacrificed her reputation—which means in the eyes of her own little world she has no character, that she is one of the big world's unfortunates, an outcast. When Tess discovers the baby is dying she carries it to the church on a Sunday morning to have it sprinkled. The pastor, under the domination of the elder, refuses the rites. The mother of the little one claims it as her own. When Tess returns to her hut she finds there her father, released from prison. A note from Elder Graves, brought by Frederick, tells of the death of Leola and her infant and asks forgiveness. So, too, does Frederick.

In spite of this grave recital there are many light moments. The scrubbing of Tess by one of the women of the huts will convulse. Her head is mercilessly plunged into a bucket of water and afterward lathered with soap. Out of the ordeal Tess makes comedy. So, too, her turning loose of the dog on her pursuer will amuse. Those wise in agricultural lore will laugh when they note the attempt of Tess to milk the cow on the wrong side. Perhaps, even yet, Little Mary does not know why the beast kicked at her so viciously.

Of dramatic situations, it may be said in all truth, there are too many to enumerate here. There are three, however, it would be unfair to ignore. One is the scene in the courtroom, where Tess breaks in as her father is condemned to die. Under the spell of her appeal to the judge she gets her father well outside the rail before the relentless elder restores the equilibrium. When Tess returns to her home and finds her father a free man and her lover come back to her, we all rejoice with her. Strongest of all, however, is the scene in the church. Tess, in her father's great boots, which she wears on necessary occasions, stalks down the aisle of the church with the baby in her arms. When the minister hesitates under the protest of Graves, Tess reaches into the font and herself vigorously sprinkles the infant. Then it is that the mother of the little one spreads consternation by her declaration "It is my baby" and takes the dying child to her breast.

Mr. Walters, as Elder Graves, gives a strong portrayal. The judge, by his sympathetic bearing, contributes to the effectiveness of the court scene. Miss Golden, as Leola, is good. So, too, is David Hartford as Daddy Skinner. The staging is praiseworthy. Especially notable is the portrayal of the rainstorm—be the same actual or simulated; as to which deponent sayeth not. The photography is Porterian.

We have said "Tess of the Storm Country" is a good picture. It is more. It is a production that grows on you as you analyze it.

Helen Dunbar

TO have been for seven years a member of Weber & Fields' famous company in the heydey of its brilliant success is a distinction of which any player may be proud. "For a real test of speed," says George Ade, "one should have a pace maker." Helen Dunbar, now with Essanay, had as pace makers during her service with Weber & Fields such shining lights as Warfield, Sam Bernard, Pete Dailey, Fay Templeton, Lillian Russell, De Wolfe Hopper, William Collier, Charles Ross, Mabel Fenton and all the rest of that remarkable cast. That she was able to make good for seven years in such smart-company is sufficient proof that she is possessed of more than ordinary ability.

Helen Dunbar.

But this is only a part of her eighteen years upon the stage. She has always been in the best of company and has no barnstorming experiences to relate. At the age of 15 she made her stage debut while attending school in Philadelphia, singing in the opera of "King Cole," sponsored by Wilson and Morse. In her fifteenth year she was married to the late Charles McClellan, a widely known theatrical manager; so, altogether, her fifteenth year was a decisive one in her life's history.

At the age of seventeen Helen Dunbar joined Pauline Hall's company and sang many comic opera roles for six seasons. Then she went with Heinrich Conreid's Comic Opera Company for two seasons in "The Black Huzzar" and "The Gypsy Bawn." After that came her seven-year engagement with Weber & Fields, following which she organized her own company, known as the English Players, and toured for two seasons in a repertoire of copyrighted plays. For the next three years she was absent from the stage. In 1911 she joined the Essanay Company at Chicago, where she has been ever since.

As a motion picture actress her renditions are superb. There is something queen-like about Helen Dunbar and the goodness of her face is like a benediction to a picture. As a society matron she has only to be herself, as much of her life has been spent in a social atmosphere. She is equally lovable in or out of a picture and those who have been her guests at home are quite sure that there is no more charming hostess in the world than Helen Dunbar.

CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY'S WORKS SECURED.

Harry Leighton has secured both dramatic and moving picture rights to all novels and short stories by Cyrus Townsend Brady. Mr. Leighton is now busy dramatizing Dr. Brady's latest book for a prominent producer. This is probably Dr. Brady's most dramatic effort and will not be published until fall. It is expected that book and play will both appear at the same time. Mr. Leighton has already adapted "Hearts Adrift" and "The Southerners" from Mr. Brady's books.

Franklin B. Coates, Explorer

Brings to New York Kinematographic Record of His Perilous Journey Across South America.

By George Blaisdell.

TO have traversed a continent for thousands of miles, a goodly portion of the distance covering ground over which the feet of white men had never been known to pass, is an achievement that falls to few men. To have brought back to civilization for the benefit of the world at large a kinematographic record of the more remarkable phases of this hitherto unknown country—views of snow-clad mountains, of torrential rock-filled streams and fever-infested swamps; intimate pictures of the savage men and women and the still more savage animals that live in it—is a rarer and greater achievement. Franklin B. Coates, comfortably seated in his office in the World Tower Building last Saturday morning, talked most interestingly of his experiences in carrying the camera into the pest hole of South America, where surely it had never been before, and where experienced camera explorers had declared it could not be taken. As he swung in his chair and looked out over the city roofs Mr. Coates told of the departure from New York last July of the Captain Besley Expedition and of some of the adventures it encountered in its three distinct trips, the last one of 1,200 miles, beginning at the source of the Amazon and ending at Iquitos, the head of navigation on the great river.

Franklin B. Coates.

There were eleven men in the party that set out from Lima, Peru, on the first expedition. At the head was Captain Besley, who, as Mr. Coates says, "has fought off the frozen sleep in the snow fields of the Far North and seen his companions die of tropical fever in the jungles of Africa." The captain is a man of means and of a craving for travel in lands most other white men avoid. Also accompanying the captain and Mr. Coates were scientists and photographers. Explorations were made in the Chanchamayo district, and many photographs were taken. It was on this trip that the expedition suffered the loss of one of their two Pathé cameras, 3,000 feet of film, dry plates, and other valuable material. The accident was due to the burden bearing mule, left alone for a moment, being seized with a desire to join his four-footed companions on the opposite shore of a steep-banked swiftly running stream. The animal got across in safety, but in climbing the sharply sloped shore fell backward. Seven of the eleven men were stricken with fever, but all recovered.

When the expedition returned to Lima and while men and beasts were resting, Captain Besley and Mr. Coates decided to travel south and explore the buried cities of the Incas, of which they heard such wonderful tales. While on this expedition the two men continued discussion of the plans for the cross-continent journey which they had determined on while in the north of Peru. Mr. Coates showed the writer hundreds of still photographs which he took in the land of the Incas and on the islands of the Sun and Moon, all marvelously interesting. The two men continued their journey south, crossed Lake Titicaca, the highest body of navigable water in the world (nearly 13,000 feet in elevation), and then by way of La Paz returned to Lima.

When Captain Besley and Mr. Coates informed their companions of the alteration in their plans and of their determination to cross the continent from the source of the Amazon to the mouth, through the uncharted Huayahamba region and then by way of the Huallaga River, instead of proceeding down the West Coast and over to Argentina, seven of the party decided to return to New York. The two who elected to go with the expedition were J. K. Holbrook, cameraman, and J. W. Dunne.

"I want to say," said Mr. Coates, in speaking of the photographer, "that Holbrook is one of the bravest and gamest men I ever met. He did without hesitation and without question everything that was asked or required of him. He was in many extremely dangerous situations, but he never flinched."

The explorers through the co-operation of the American Minister got in touch with President Billinghurst, of Peru, who, while advising against the trip, promised them every assistance in his power. He said that the eight men who had been known to attempt the exploration of that particular section of country had never been heard from. The President wanted to detail soldiers to accompany the expedition, but the Americans decided that it would be safer without them. Mr. Coates explained that the Indians in the interior have suffered much at the hands of the Peruvians and Brazilians, and in those sections at the first move of a white man that to them seems suspicious they attack.

Expedition at Outskirts of Civilization Cutting Into Jungle.

By railroad the party proceeded to Cerro de Pasco, the highest city in the world, the elevation being over 14,000 feet and the population represented by about the same figures. Here they picked up their animals, where they had been left on the return from the first trip. Five days' travel in the saddle brought them to Huanuco, called the end of the white man's travels, where the parting of men and horses took place.

Indian Oarsmen Guiding Raft Out of Rapids on Huallaga River.

Eighteen days were required to reach the River Huallaga, where the raft journey began. It was a succession of falls, whirlpools and rapids. For thirty-six days of actual traveling the little band journeyed on this frail craft, the last six of which included nights as well. The men made frequent long trips into the interior for subjects for their cameras. The perils here were even greater than in the boiling currents of the river. The nights were divided into four watches. Mr. Coates said that on awakening it was necessary to institute a most searching examination of the immediate surroundings before making a move, to make sure there were no snakes or reptiles nestling about. If there were any of these unpleasant bedfellows it was essential that they make the first move. Otherwise they were very likely to strike.

The explorers had promised President Billinghurst to pass through the Pampa del Sacramento in order to discover if possible the fate of Mirko Seljan and Patrick O'Higgins, two missing American explorers. They found what they believed to be the trail of the men, and for six days followed it. This was possible, as practically every step of the way had once been cut with a machete. When the end of this hewed path was reached the four men used the point as a center of their search and circled around it. Two hundred yards into the jungle they found the bones of the two men. They gave to the grim reminders of their own perils an impressive Christian burial and erected a cross.

These land trips often taxed the patience of the travelers by reason of the disinclination of the animal inhabitants to come forward and have their pictures taken. "At times," said Mr. Coates, "we couldn't seem to get together with the animals. The vegetation was so dense we could do nothing but bait and wait. We waited for two days for one tiger which we had been trying to lure with live bait. We got him, though. It was too bad we had to kill him after we got his picture, but he foolishly jumped at the camera. Besley was on one side of the tripod and I was on the other, and you may be sure we had our rifles sighted and our fingers on the triggers.

"We got some wonderful snake pictures. We got one of a big boa only ten feet from the camera; he will go right across the screen. He had been traveling in a circle and his head swung around in our direction. You know those fellows carry a wallop when they swing their tails. This chap suddenly showed signs of excitement as he heard the click of the camera. Besley and I both pumped four or five shots into him. We thought it just as well when we measured him. How long was he? Forty-two feet. We got some good pictures of small poisonous snakes. If they got too close we put a forked stick over their necks.

"Sometimes drifting down river we would see an animal come out of the jungle to drink. Then we would have to act quickly. We would make for the shore, anchor our raft, then cut and work our way back to the point, plant our camera and wait for the return of our subject.

"How did we live? Well, as we were on this trip two months longer than we expected, we had to live on the game of the country a good deal. There were many times we did not have all we wanted to eat. Do you know parrots are not such bad eating? And as to monkey meat the worst of that is in the name. Some men liken it to chicken. We were three months practically in unexplored territory, a portion of that time in unknown lands with unknown Indians, savages the world has never met, and we had no way of getting a line on them. We had serious trouble with them only once. In hunting for game the Indians may have thought we meant harm to them. The first we knew was a fall of arrows—and we also knew that without question there was poison on the arrowtips. It was a two days' running fight, but we managed to get out of their section with unpunctured skins.

"You know an Indian down there will not go beyond the territory of his own tribe. That kept us constantly on the search for new helpers. We made it a practice not to avoid the Indians, but when we came to a camp or settlement to go right in and seek out the chief. Our experiences with the Indians would make a long story. I will say, though, that those of them who know the white man think little of him, as you may judge when I tell you that if we wanted to distribute trinkets we could do it only through the chiefs.

"We had some pleasant times in spite of the hardships, although they were few and far between, but we enjoyed them all the more. I don't know of a trip where men were placed under the trying conditions we were. On the raft we could not move. And yet you may imagine we had long since talked ourselves out—that we had told each other all we knew. Yes, New York seems mighty good to me." And the explorer swung around in his chair and looked over the city.

Mr. Coates faced one bitter disappointment on his return to the metropolis. When he started on the trip into the jungle he put all the kinematographic results of his first two trips into a trunk, which was to be shipped to New York from Lima. When the trunk was opened in the appraiser's office here it was discovered that all the films had been abstracted. Mr. Coates has employed the Burns agency and offered a reward of $1,000 for the return of the film and no questions asked. It is small consolation to him that the film cannot be shown without exposing the thieves to arrest. Mr. Coates needs it in his own business. He says if in thirty days he gets no returns from the circulars he is sending out he will start for Peru and retake all the locations he photographed before. Captain Besley, who is in London, will arrange to meet Mr. Coates in Peru and take part in the expedition. Of the Amazon trip Mr. Coates brought back 7,000 feet in perfect condition, which he will cut to 5,000. It is Mr. Coates' intention to go on the lecture platform with his pictures. If he is compelled to make another trip to South America he will defer his lecture tour until next fall.

Cleo Madison.

Will Play Female Leads in Gold Seal Dramas—Wilfred Lucas to Direct New Company.

CLEO MADISON, who has been in motion pictures but six months, and during that time has won a place of distinction as one of the foremost emotional actresses in films, will be featured as the leading woman by the Universal in a Gold Seal Company, of which Wilfred Lucas will be director. Before entering the motion picture field Miss Madison had wide and prolonged experience on the legitimate stage.

She came to the Universal Company as a novice in motion picture work, but her worth and talents won recognition at once. She scored success after success in the productions of Otis Turner. Her most recent work has been in the Victor Company, where she played leads opposite J. Warren Kerrigan.

Cleo Madison.

Wilfred Lucas, who, after a survey of the entire field, has been chosen to direct Miss Madison, is an old and experienced hand in motion picture production, having been in the business for seven years. For a number of years he played leads with the Biograph Company. On a previous occasion he has directed for the Universal Company. He is responsible for such Universal masterpieces as "At Midnight," "Below Stairs," "The Smuggler's Daughter," and "Honor of the Regiment."

The first production in which Miss Madison will be seen under the direction of Mr. Lucas will be entitled "The Mystery of Wickham Hall," a powerful psychological drama.

The Unopened Letter

Two-Reel Edison Feature. Released Through General Film Company.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE incidents of this story are contrived to lead up to an interesting situation and one of large dramatic possibilities. The situation is that of a father, an attorney of large practice, acting for defendants in a case where his own daughter, of whose existence he is unaware, is the plaintiff. He married when in college and was obliged to keep the wedding a secret because his own father had put a ban upon any such serious step until the boy had qualified in business. Having proved his ability and been taken into the firm, he returns to the home of his young wife only to be informed that she is dead and buried. He thereafter devotes himself to the profession of law, and twenty years elapse before it comes to his knowledge in a highly dramatic way that he has a child, plaintiff in a case he is defending.

This makes an interesting story—the author is Bliss Milford—and one that holds in spite of the treatment rather than on account of it. In many cases the way a scenario is handled brings out effects superior to the playwright's conception. In this case the director handles his settings with good taste and his actors as if afraid they would transcend it. With a bright company, headed by Bessie Learn, composed of Edward Earle, Margaret McWade, Charles Sutton, M. C. Mack, Marjorie Ellison, Harry Beaumont, Edwin Clark, William West, Harry Eytinge and William Bechtel, pretty close to a star cast, and plenty of chance for these interpreters to exercise their artistry, their movements are directed in a way that obscures when it should clarify. This is not an auditory art but a visual one.

Scene from "The Unopened Letter" (Edison).

That the father was unaware of his child came about partly through the fact that a letter he wrote to his wife shortly after her death was returned by her sister unopened. He goes to see what is wrong and the surviving sister, believing that he has caused his young wife's death, tells him of that but not of the child. We are willing to accept the premise that a keen lawyer would not make any further inquiry about the woman he loved and married—that is possible, though not in accord with human experience—but it was not made clear to me why a young wife would not or could not let her husband know that a child was expected and failed to notify him when the child was born. Great pains should be taken in making immediately plausible the ultimate event upon which the entire plot depends. This could have been easily done by one of many well-known expedients, sympathy aroused by the young wife's inability to let her husband know of the great event and the whole play given the strength and dignity necessary in serious drama.

The whole trend of Edison releases is away from theatrical artificiality and toward such stories of human life as shall be credibly within the cognizance of the audience. The characters must do as human beings ordinarily would under the circumstances. This is in response to the popular demand for more logic of cause and effect. "The Unopened Letter" will please because it is a good story, but its value is partially submerged by handling that clouds it at moments and that does not give full vent to what the interpreters could accomplish. Do not be afraid of intense acting for screen purposes. What may appear too intense under the powerful studio lamps becomes greatly modified when seen from a back seat in a big picture show.

Pearl Sindelar.

MISS SINDELAR, leading lady of the Pathe Company, is considered one of the most finished and capable photoplay artistes appearing in this country. Her magnetism is marvelous. She has gained a multitudinous following, attested to by the patronage enjoyed by the theaters where the pictures in which she appears are exhibited. She is designated as "The Lavender Lady," on account of her fondness for the color "of old memories." John Temple McCarthy, one of the real "Forty-niners," who founded the Phi Gamma Delta, now one of the strongest college fraternities in existence is her grandfather. When a dramatic star she was entertained, while en tour in every city where the fraternity existed.

Pearl Sindelar.

The writer called at her studio, 253 West Forty-second Street, and was graciously welcomed. It was lunch hour and he was invited to bite a few chunks out of the collation. There was no indication that lunch could be served in the exquisitely furnished apartment, but in the twinkling of an eye a little East Indian maid had a dainty lunch served for four people who were present.

While entertaining her guests a brief outline of her professional life was expounded on request, and she confessed to having been engaged in theatrical work since she was ten years old, not so many years ago, at that, playing in stock, east and west, with almost all the prominent companies. She also starred in a vaudeville offering on the Keith circuit, entitled, "The Price of a Hat." Miss Sindelar possesses a sweet voice and wonderful magnetism, as mentioned above. Her success in the silent drama has created a popularity throughout the country that has obtained for her almost a personal acquaintance, and she will be greatly welcomed in speaking parts again. A hint (almost confirmed) was dropped that she is to star in a Broadway production next season under the management of A. H. Woods, who is to be congratulated on his selection, and he evidently was guided by experience, as Miss Sindelar was under his management very recently, playing the lead in the "Girl in the Taxi."

Miss Sindelar has a "repository" corner in her studio where she hordes the many letters she receives from all over the world from admirers of her work, especially from young girls and children.

Eclair Factory Fire

Destroys Building and Many Valuable Negatives—Plans Perfected for New Fire-Proof Structure.

ON the afternoon of Thursday, March 19, the factory of the Eclair Film Company at Leynwood Avenue, near Main Street, Fort Lee, N. J., was entirely destroyed by fire, which left standing only the outer walls of the building. The fire is believed to have originated through a short-circuit in some of the electrical connections and was quickly transmitted to the film stock in the adjoining room. In a very few minutes the interior of the factory was ablaze. Strenuous efforts were made by the employees to save property, but means of fighting the fire were so inadequate that but little was accomplished.

Photo Showing the Pitifully Inadequate Water Pressure Furnished by the Hackensack Water Supply at the Fire Which Destroyed the Factory and Mechanical Plant of the Eclair Film Company on Thursday Afternoon, March 19th.

The efforts of Francis Doublier and Irene Whipple, employees, were almost superhuman. Both returned to the blazing structure again and again, for film. On one trip Mr. Doublier managed to lift a large desk, filled with scripts, and threw it out of a window. He scrambled after it and just escaped the falling timbers of the roof and was picked up almost unconscious.

Owing to the lack of adequate pressure in the water mains it was impossible to fight the fire, which might have otherwise been confined to the room in which it started. One of the illustrations here given shows the puny stream that was obtained from the main. As there are many other motion picture factories in Fort Lee, as well as business and residence buildings depending upon this means of protection against fire, a strong movement has been started to compel the water company to give better water service.

The building burned was occupied by the manufacturing plant of the Eclair Company, including the developing, printing and joining rooms, the machine shop and storage vault together with the offices of the manager and superintendent of the factory. The studio was not damaged as it is about one hundred feet away from the factory building.

Photograph Showing the Lack of Hose Lines and the Terrific Headway Which the Fire Gained Because of Lack of Water.

Quite a number of valuable negatives and a number of positive prints were destroyed. Among the negatives lost was one of the subject "Protea" and of the subject, "Mephistophelia," the latter being for this week's release.

Almost before the smoke had blown away Manager Offeman was in communication with President Jourjon, in Paris, and arrangements were made to start work in a new fire-proof factory building. President Jourjon took the first available steamship for New York and is expected to arrive here Monday, March 30, when the work of reconstruction will start in earnest.

Arrangements were made with the Gaumont company to handle the immediate work of the Eclair Company so that, with the exception of the negatives lost, its releases will be made on time. More permanent arrangements were made subsequently to use the new Horsley factory at Bayonne, N. J., where the Eclair employees will be engaged until the new Eclair factory is completed.

Among the recent productions destroyed at the Eclair plant were the first negatives and prints of "The Gentleman From Mississippi," which was being produced by W. A. Brady with Thomas Wise in the cast. The Shuberts were also interested in several productions being put on at the Eclair studio, but none of the properties were damaged.

Fine Work

By F. H. Richardson.

It is a distinct pleasure to be able to praise instead of criticise and condemn. On the night of March 11, the writer visited the Duffield Street Theater, on Duffield Street, just off Fulton Street, Brooklyn, of which H. B. Arden is manager. My visit was purely accidental. I was attracted by the quietly beautiful and dignified front, with its tastefully displayed posters, and remarkably neat electric signs. This house was opened December 19, 1913. It seats 842 on the main floor and in the balcony. It is absolutely a fireproof house, built entirely of steel, concrete and brick, and was designed wholly and entirely for a photoplay theater.

The operating room is very good, indeed, though it cannot be said to be ideal, by reason of the fact that both the floor and ceiling lie on two planes, as though the front half of the room were cut off and raised up about two feet, both ceiling and floor. This, I think, was an error in construction, but it is not a serious matter. The ventilation of the operating room is excellent, its walls are of either brick or concrete, I forgot to ask which, and everything is handily arranged. The projection equipment consists of two regular Simplex machines and a Simplex Kinemacolor.

I was in the house more than an hour before the operators, Messrs. Gustave Phillips, chief, and Anthony Ruskin, assistant, knew of my presence, and in all that time I had no fault whatever to find with the projection. The screen is of plaster; the light was brilliant, and at no time was there a shadow on the screen, also the speed was well gauged. I compliment Operators Phillips and Ruskin on the excellence of their performance.

Mr. Arden impresses me as a manager who is a real manager—one who not only makes a study of his business, but is broad-minded, progressive and energetic. He is now operating on a 10 and 15 cent admission, with a special day, Tuesday, at 10, 15 and 20 cents, but the ultimate intention is, when the house has thoroughly established itself, to raise the admission to 15, 20 and 25 cents. Mr. Arden has "10-cent" competitors in the neighborhood, and I believe some "5-cent" ones, but his house is nevertheless filled to overflowing at the higher price and, although the theater is new and comparatively unknown, it has already established a sufficient clientele to enable it to not only break even, but to also liquidate first cost, close to $200,000 (including ground value), inside of ten years. And if Mr. Arden can establish that kind of a business within four months it is a foregone conclusion he will have a far better one in the near future.

The house is tastefully, though plainly decorated, and the seats are leather upholstered.

Again, I say it is a pleasure to find a house to which I can give unstinted praise instead of roasting.

Mr. Arden is assisted by Mr. Henry C. Jarvis, most able and affable gentleman who is treasurer of the company and presides at the box office.

RICHMOND'S REGENT THEATER SUCCESSFUL.

George Balsdon, general manager of the Photoplay Theater Company of New York, has just returned from a trip to Richmond, Va., where the company is operating a high-class house called the Regent Theater. This house seats 670 persons and is showing such features as "Cloister and the Hearth," "Germinal," "Old Curiosity Shop" and "David Copperfield," to a ten-cent admission price with most satisfactory results. The Regent is getting the best class of patronage and is becoming very popular with the people of Richmond under its present management.

A General for a Day

Fritz Wagner, Pathé Cameraman in Mexico, Commands President Huerta's Army for the Weekly.

HUERTA'S army reached New York, Sunday, March 22—3,000 feet of it, measured for Pathe's Weekly—and with it came a tale of how Fritz Wagner, the man who turned the camera crank, became for the space of a day "General" Wagner, Commander-in-chief of the Federal forces in Mexico City. Also came a cablegram to Pathe from the perspiring Fritz, reading as follows:—

"Still in hospital with over-cranked arm. Better send somebody else."

With the film came a letter explaining Fritz's disability—that rarest of ills to which only motion picture camera men are heir, partial paralysis of the right wing due to an overdose of turning the camera crank.

Before Wagner joined the staff of motion picture camera men on Pathe's Weekly, he had never commanded an army, nor issued orders to anyone except the waiters in the beer gardens back in Berlin. But Fritz hankered for adventure, and adventure suited to his liking seemed to lie across the seas. So he loaded his rapid-fire camera, bought a villainous-looking automatic revolver, and sailed for New York and eventually for Mexico, with orders from Pathe's Weekly to take Huerta and his army, dead or alive—preferably half shot.

Armed with formidable letters of introduction to President Huerta, and reinforced by the camera and the gun, Fritz invaded Mexico City. He found Huerta, who invited him into his private office and placed Mexico at his disposal.

"Back in the United States the people say you are going to lose your job, Herr Werther," began Fritz, nervously fingering this automatic in his pocket.

"They don't think you have got any army already."

Huerta snorted—then smiled. "I have thousands men—good men, ah! such brave fellows—here in Mexico City, Senor Wagner," he said. "Villa, what has he? Bah! Robbers, yes?"

"They say your army is a—a load of the junk, a piece of cheese, Herr Werther. They say——"

But Huerta turned away and pressed a button on his desk.

"Let me misunderstand you right, Herr Werther," Fritz exclaimed hastily, one eye on the button the other on the door. "Maybe, yes, you have 20,000 good men, but"——and he shrugged his shoulders.

"You wish to see them for Pathe, Senor Wagner and you shall," replied Huerta. "You shall take the moving photo of them, yes? And show them to that Senor Wilson at Washington! Ah!" Then, to the attendant who answered his ring on the buzzer: "Get out the army. Parade it past the door. And you, Senor Wagner, shall make the moving photos as it passes."

So the army came out and paraded past the palace—foot-soldiers, horse-soldiers, artillery and even the fire department, a long line of many marching troops; paraded for an hour past the palace door with Fritz standing in the doorway and Huerta at his elbow. In ten minutes Fritz was perspiring. He had twice as much as he could use and the parade had hardly started. So he stopped turning, mopped his forehead and asked for a glass of beer.

"Later, my dear Senor Wagner," replied Huerta, "but now you must make those moving photos move; so please turn the machine."

Fritz turned again—miles and miles of the army marched past—Fritz's arm smarted and burned and flamed. Once he stopped again and looked back at his smiling host. A little knot of scowling guards, each with a modern rifle in his hands, had gathered behind him in the doorway. Fritz fairly snapped at the camera and made it spin.

After a while the last soldier filed past, the march ended and Fritz fell into a chair. "Some army, Herr Werther," he gasped and then, with the light of a new-born thought in his eye, "but can they fight?"

"Oh, yes, Senor Wagner; but you shall see. To you, Senor Wagner, I give my army for the rest of the day, without siesta. You shall make it do as you choose for the little moving photos. For you, it shoots, it charges, it lies down, it plays dead, yes? But you must keep it busy, Senor Wagner, and send back to that Senor Wilson those moving photos. For him I make you General Wagner today."

So Fritz was escorted by the scowling guards with the ugly rifles to the city line and there found awaiting him the Huerta army.

"It is too much, already," gasped Fritz. "Here you"—addressing a dignified general on horseback—"make 'em go way."

Finally Fritz sent the army home—except a regiment each of cavalry and infantry. With his right arm swollen and aching, he would have sent these home, too, but the guard would have none of it.

Through the short, parched grass all afternoon those regiments marched and countermarched before the camera. They charged and retreated, dismounted and mounted again, forded a stream and climbed the hills, played dead and stalked an invisible foe—maneuvred as never before, till the Pathe cameraman's arm was twice its natural size and his noble heart was breaking all the speed laws in the Republic.

Then came night and General Wagner became once more plain Herr Wagner. But the lust for adventure that had burned under his vest was satisfied. The nurses say he turned the crank all night. However that may be, a Huerta emissary took his film to Vera Cruz and saw it safely aboard a vessel while the nurses tied cooling bandages about Fritz's oversped arm.

CLAIRE WHITNEY.

IN answer to a question as to which she liked the better, the footlights or the studio, the popular young Solax star, Miss Claire Whitney, who has recently attracted attention by her artistic work under the master-hand of Mme. Alice Blaché, made this interesting statement.

Claire Whitney.

"After see-sawing for nearly five years between the 'Glory of the Footlights' and the 'Click of the Motion Picture Camera,' the lure of the silent drama has won me and I am now and for evermore established in the motion picture field playing leading parts in all Solax and Blaché features, with whom I have been for the past six months.

When I was a little girl, I was quite a toe dancer and everybody conceded I had a great future; but the stage then held no charms for me; dolls were my whole interest in life. Years went by, school days came and passed and the time arrived when I had to 'steer the boat' myself, the golden spoon having been mislaid at my birth. It seemed only natural to choose the stage; my dancing as a child having always remained dominant, so that now it seems like second nature to acquire the most difficult steps with only a few moments practice. Well, after the trials that all beginners experience, I received an engagement in a vaudeville act with Mr. Frank Sheridan. At the close of the season I went to the Biograph Company, more as a lark than anything else, and when the regular theatrical season began again, I was back with a musical stock company. But the picture germ had gotten in my system and commenced to multiply and I started to make comparisons between the night's work at the theater and your evening off to do as you like in pictures; the worry of bad business in the theater with the regular weekly envelope of the pictures; the long parts, tedious rehearsals, and the thousand and one annoyances that you are heir to around the theater, against the pleasant environment of the studio and home. Then, again, no one could have closed their eyes to the magnitude the motion picture business was assuming and the inroads it was making upon the theater. Everywhere theaters were closing their doors, pictures taking the place of the players, and the silent actor having his clientele of admirers the same as the stage, only where the actor of the theater could play to but one audience a night, the picture artist was being seen in hundreds of theaters throughout the country by thousands. But, notwithstanding all this, after a season with Marion Leonard, a most enjoyable engagement, I thought the theater clamored for me, and again I trod the boards with Louise Galloway in her wonderful sketch, 'The Little 'Mother,' with which I traveled to the Coast and back.

I refused a second season with the act and became associated with the Solax Company at Fort Lee, where I am very happy, having found my 'forte' and stage life is becoming dimmer and dimmer every day, to be looked back upon now as an experience to be talked of at home."

Miss Whitney is a New York girl, having been born and raised in the city of skyscrapers.

"The Great Diamond Robbery"

Playgoers Film Company Makes its Debut in a Stirring Six-Part Melodrama Enacted by a Fine Cast.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WHEN a new company makes its bow to the film public one may be pardoned a reasonable amount of curiosity as to the quality of its initial product. If a producer is able to make a good showing in his first picture we are justified in the belief that he may do big things when he gets into his stride. Daniel V. Arthur unquestionably makes a showing in the six-part subject "The Great Diamond Robbery." In the first place, he has a good story. It is old-fashioned melodrama, to be sure; but it is of the sort that will interest and at times thrill the present-day orchestra, even as it must have old-time playgoers. The cast is excellent. It is composed of seasoned players, of men and of women old enough to vote. The settings are such as we have a right to expect in a good or pretentious production. It is the natural thing they should be, considering they were under the direction of Edward A. Morange. At the showing for the trade, on Saturday morning in the American Theater, there was a competent orchestra to add to the attractiveness of the picture.

"The Great Diamond Robbery" is a story of action, consecutive, rapid. As the title indicates, there is a robbery: in fact, there are two of the same set of gems, and the theft each time is committed by the same person—a dashing, clever woman, and one who knows how to wear clothes, as an interested feminine observer remarked. Gail Kane has the part of Maria, a Brazilian adventuress. It is a remarkably fine portrayal she gives us. Maria is as wicked as she is charming, as conscienceless as she is attractive to men. On but one occasion does she betray fear; that is when following the murder of her husband she shrinks for a moment as she reaches across the body of the banker and secures an incriminating letter. Miss Kane, by her daring, is fully entitled to rank as a photoplay star. Her descent of the fire-escape ladder thrilled her friends at the American. But this was child's play compared to the fall down the stairs and the somersault following her suicide. The sensational flop may have had the co-operation of a good cameraman, but there is nothing to prove it.

Wallace Eddinger is Dick Brummage, a private detective, and he has adventures a-plenty. Brummage is in love with Mary Lavelot, played by Dorothy Arthur. The two are the only lovers in the story, if we except the affairs of Maria, and their wooing adds materially to the interest of the play. The first appearance of the two in the office of Brummage, where Mary is the stenographer, is marked by clever touches that will grip interest in them right at the inception. Miss Arthur has a sweet personality. Mr. Eddinger is one who takes pleasure in his work—he is virile, enthusiastic, and he has magnetism. He has much to do in the last half of the picture, and he does it all well. Charles J. Ross, as Mr. Bulford, gives a finished performance. Elita Proctor Otis is Mother Rosenbaum, a "fence"; she plays the part finely. Others in the large cast who had much to do were Martin J. Alsop, Stapleton Kent, Herbert Barrington, Edward Gillespie and Percy Standing.

The story opens in St. Petersburg. Added realism was obtained in the photographing of the exterior in this part of the picture by reason of the work being done just after the recent heavy snowstorm in New York. It gave atmosphere not always easily attained in the metropolis. Later the plot shifts to New York, where strangly enough, melodramatically enough, sooner or later all the characters also shift. It is in the fifth reel that we get a genuine thrill. It is not of the essentially legitimate dramatic quality, of the sort that stirs the heart. The situations in this part rouse the blood; we repeat, it is a genuine thrill and one of unusual dimensions. It is melodrama triumphant.

Universal Syndicate Series

Combination of Forty Leading Daily Papers Formed to Exploit "Lucille Love, the Girl of Mystery."

THE A. P. Robyn Newspaper Syndicate, of Chicago, has concluded arrangements with some forty leading daily papers of the country to publish serially a fascinating romance entitled "Lucille Love, the Girl of Mystery." The author of the story, though not named in the information given the Moving Picture World, is said to be one of the best known fiction writers of the day, for whom versatility and marvelous descriptive abilities have won the title of "the master pen," and is also said to have the largest reading constituency of any of the better known writers of today. For reasons best known to the publishers his name will not be divulged until the story has been almost completed.

When the story was undertaken it was planned with the possibilities of picture production in mind, and the task of depicting the author's conceptions in motion has been undertaken by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Already the Universal has made a considerable outlay in the work of preparation; a special company has been organized, properties purchased and elaborate arrangements made for producing the picture on an extensive scale.

This story is not a hackneyed affair; it is original in every detail, carrying the best efforts of the author. Every scene that is spoken of in this story will be seen in the films because the author has looked ahead of the mere writing of the story to the point where it would be put in motion pictures. This thrilling story will be printed by at least one of the leading newspapers in the immediate neighborhood of every Universal exhibitor and along with the story will be printed a list of the theaters where this feature can be seen that same day or the day following. While this story reaches a high literary standard it is essentially sensational. It is sensational in the situations it evolves, the daring risks demanded to be taken by the players who will be seen in the story, in the spectacularism it will disclose, such as adventures with wild animals, death-defying dashes in airships and the burning of ocean greyhounds. "Lucille Love" will be released in two-reel installments every week for fifteen consecutive weeks. The first two reels of this story, a soul-thrilling one of love, devotion, danger and intrigue, have already been produced.

ARTHUR WARDE CHANGES PLACES.

Arthur F. Warde has resigned from the press department of the George Kleine attractions to assume charge of the publicity department of the new Strand Theater, Broadway and 47th Street, which will probably open Saturday, April 11.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to the World.)

IN an action for alleged infringement of copyright Monsieur Paul Hervieu, the author and playwright, secured judgment for one thousand dollars against the Gaumont Company. Defendants were also ordered to destroy the film in question.

Frederick Burlingham, the cameraman who took the film, "Down the Crater of Vesuvius" (B. & C.) is well known to Parisians, and this is not the first occasion his name and photograph have been circulated throughout the globe. World readers who remember the famous Steinheil murder mystery will recall the sensation caused by the arrest of the "man with the red beard." Frederick Burlingham was supposed to be "the man with the red beard," but he succeeded in proving an alibi and was released. His photograph attached to "Down the Crater of Vesuvius" was but an echo of this famous trial and for this reason the film has created quite a furore at the Pathe Palace, where it has played to capacity business for fifteen days. Mr. Burlingham is a resident of Paris. Before entering the world of moving pictures he was a photographer.

The film of the week here is Gaumont's "Fantomas." It is packing the Gaumont Palace, Hippodrome and several other important places.

Forty-eight of the leading Paris picture theaters booked, boomed and drew capacity business with the great Henny Porten, Messeter triumph, "Heroism of a French Woman." Charles Mary, of the Societé Commerciale du Film, is now booking as fast as he can dates for provincial exhibition.

The name of Henny Porten is on the lips of every man in the trade and at least one of her photographs is to be seen in every film office in Paris.

The Establissements Paul Christy offer for sale the negative of "Down a Mine."

Lamy, of Cinema Center, has sold the United States rights of "William Tell."

The cinematograph was not voted by readers of the "Matin" as one of the seven marvels of the world, but nevertheless the moving picture projector is highly thought of by French people, for it came ninth on a list of forty-five wonderful inventions. The telephone was eighth and X-ray tenth. The bioscope came before the telegraph, submarine, discovery of the poles, phonograph, and incandescent lamp.

To put an end to conflicting statements which have been circulated, Mlle. On March 27th the Agence Generale will release "Adrienne Lecouvreur," featuring Sarah Bernhardt. The same firm will also release an exciting Danish drama, entitled "The Red Club." The latter is the work of the Dansk Kinograf Films Company.

The German correspondent of the Ciné Journal announces that the Cines Company of Rome and the Cines Theater Aktien Gessellschaft of Berlin have cancelled their contracts. A German Cines company is to be formed and in addition to marketing the parent company's productions will handle other brands which may possibly include Lubin films. Cines in Berlin will now be known as the Palast Theater Aktien Gesellschaft.

Madge Lessing's second photoplay, "The Blue Mouse," has proved a decided winner at the Wiener Lichtspiel Theater. It is in four acts with special music by Ludwig Gruber. Henny Porten, Asta Nielsen, Madge Lessing, Bunny, Max Linder and Prince are still in the front rank of Vienna's screen favorites.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to the World.)

THE topic of the week in London filmdom is the proposed action of the London County Council in seeking Parliamentary powers to subject renters', manufacturers', and agents' premises where private exhibitions are held, to the same stringent conditions at present governing public theaters under its jurisdiction. A special meeting was attended by the leading renters and manufacturers, many of whom made the journey to the metropolis from the provinces at a few hours' notice. The high-handed interference with showrooms and buildings of a strictly trade and private character originated about a year ago at Leeds, when a local renting firm was summoned by the police for exhibiting films in unlicensed premises, viz: their private showroom. The charge was deferred and procrastinated to such a degree that trade interest in the case waned, despite the ultimate unsatisfactory ruling of the court, as mentioned in this journal at the time. It is safe to assume that the London County Council has taken its cue from the example of Leeds and a recent case at Birmingham in which the magistrate's decision was that trade premises do not come within the meaning of the Act of 1909. The meeting finally pleged itself to oppose the action with a resolution agreeing that each of the eighty-two trade members (including eleven American representatives) should if necessary finance the protest to the extent of $100 each.

The Cines Company, of Rome, is organizing another competitior for moving picture enthusiasts in Europe and presumably the noted Italian firm will extend the offer to American patrons. For the best answers to a series of questions analyzing their own products the company will award six conducted tours to Rome and back, including a visit to the Cines studios and factories.

The Tress Company, of London, claims to have obviated the disadvantageous procedure of re-winding films. They have already placed on the British market a pair of magazines adaptable to any projector. The bottom magazine is in the ordinary upright position, but the top one is fixed horizontally and contains within it a turn table. The unspooled film is laid upon this and unwound into the gate from the middle.

The first products of the Canadian Bioscope Company, which has just finished three split-reel subjects in Nova Scotia, are announced for release in three weeks. Messrs. Anderson, Vay, Hubert and Blumberg, of Rupert Street, London, are the British agents of the new company.

R. S. Edmondson, the chief of the American Film Releases depot in England, is well on his way to New York, probably with the intention of securing features to handle on this side. Mr. Edmondson will remain in the United States for a few weeks.

Emboldened by the unprecedented success, particularly in the United States, of the Dickens' pictures, the Hepworth Company is now very busy producing a series based on the literary masterpieces of Charles Reade. The first of these will be "The Cloister and the Hearth." The recent Hepworth success, "David Copperfield," has been received in America in a manner that quite exceeded the anticipations of the producers, but the new series is on a still more lavish scale and record bookings for the first release are predicted by Mr. Blinkhorn, their American agent.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

The Director—Present and Future

By Madame Alice Blaché.

To the same degree that it is impossible for a painter to tell how he paints his canvases and the sculptor to explain how he fashions his statues, is it impossible for a producer of motion pictures to divulge the secret of the making of an artistic photodrama. There is no doubt in the minds of the initiated that that inborn something which makes it possible for the artists of the brush and the clay to tell their soul's secrets through the medium of color and shape is the same inherent possession which allows the motion picture producer to create a photoplay which, regardless of story value or natural dramatic worth, holds the audience as spell-bound as the performance of a master musician.

Just as there are thousands of men making a living by playing the piano to every true soloist, there are many men staging photodramas to every director worthy of the name. And it is not strange that this should be the case, especially in view of the fact that the art has grown out of all proportions to the rate that producers of real worth could be selected and schooled for the work; for pictures the public demanded and pictures the public had to be given, regardless of quality or artistic merit.

But the motion picture art is experiencing a rapid change. It seems perfectly safe to say that the days of the inferior photoplay productions are numbered. Already the carefully staged offering marked by the hand of true genius is seen occupying the same theater for many consecutive days to the exclusion of dozens of photodramas formerly considered good enough to force upon the public at the rate of five or six a day. The changed condition of affairs, which makes this possible, marks the doom of the "commercial" picture and the triumph of the production of artistic worth.

With the power of selection placed in the hands of the public, will come the weeding out of the director who does not possess the true qualifications for the important position which he has assumed and the coming into his own of the artist whose magic touch is responsible for the truly great photodrama. It is then that we will bid a fond adieu to the succession of lantern slides, once called moving pictures, and welcome with a glad shout of joy the advent of the silent drama—pronounced with a broad "a."

"ONCE OVER"

By Hugh Hoffman.

ENGAGING an opera singer to act in motion pictures is rather a pity, since it silences the kind of voice that is all too rare in this world. It would have been a better service to mankind to have engaged as many cabaret singers as possible.

Opera singers are appearing at the Screen Club also. While one of them was warbling the other day Charley Eldridge remarked, "Won't that sound fine in a picture?"

One of them kissed Glen White in the mouth and called him "Ze grand bebe." Spoiled Glen's whole evening.

Our faith in moving pictures is so strong we are disposed to believe almost anything in their favor, but when we are asked to believe that a Greek saw his own brother killed in a Turkish war picture—something feels like it is going to "bust."

The New York Globe, referring to its month old motion picture department, says:

They think this is about the most original idea ever presented to the public in typical form. Who's they? Why, all the readers of "The Globe." We think this moving picture department is a very original scheme on our part.

Why this modesty when friend Globe could just as easily have claimed the discovery of motion pictures?

Bert Adler, besides being the proprietor of the worst automobile in the world, is also the owner of the closest spacing typewriter in the business, which makes it impossible to read between the lines for any hidden meaning that may be there.

Yes—and there are others. With press agents close-spacing everything, on the thinnest paper possible, one would suppose that paper was worth about a dollar a sheet.

The alibi is that it saves postage.

A pile of saved postage stamps may look very pretty to the boss on inventory day, but they hardly compensate for a waste basket full of unpublished publicity.

You may show all the massacre scenes you want, but there musn't be any killing in them.—(Major Funkhouser).

An editorial in the Columbia (S. C.) State, commenting on Civil War dramas in moving pictures, winds up as follows:

If there is to be any more "war talk" between the sections, we, for one, are in favor of letting the "dam Yankees" wave the bloody shirt.

We, of the South, are determined to keep ours on, where it will do the most good.

Quite proper, Columbia. Keep your shirt on.

Patrons of the defunct school for moving picture acting at Hartford, Conn., have learned one lesson anyhow.

Who would ever think of Hartford as a place to start such a school when New York is so handy and so full of dramatic larvae?

The Major (Funkhouser) was asked about the refusal of a permit months ago for "The Scarlet Letter."

"I'll merely answer that with another question," he said. "How would you explain that story to a 13 year old girl?"—(News Item).

That's easy. Don't explain it. Or, find some other bird that will be as useful as the stork has been in cases of persistent juvenile cross-examination.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

Intelligent Application.

I HEARD an orchestra play an operatic selection to a dramatic picture the other day, and the manner in which it was fitted betokened skill on the part of the fitters. The orchestra was W. E. King's; the theater was the Orpheum, Chicago. The picture was Edison's "Price of a Necklace," and the selection was from "Ernani." (C. Fischer's publication.) The selection was made to fit the action of the picture. An andante movement was cut out entirely, as it came in an inappropriate part of the picture. As the first part of the picture does not call for any distinctly descriptive music, the main body of the selection (with the exception of the eliminated slow movement) answered very well. The music was worked along so that the last movement (an allegro) began about the time the stock exchange scenes were shown. This movement—which was the finale—was repeated several times. Its agitated character was in keeping with the spirit of the scenes. Instead of coming to a dead stop at the end of the selection as is so often the custom elsewhere, this orchestra kept the music going until the character of the scene called for a change in the character of the music. It was played piano and forte to action of course, and ended at the ballroom scene when a dance was played (waltz or two-step—I've forgotten which), keeping time with the dancers. The remainder of the picture was appropriately accompanied as well, but I wish particularly to comment on the selection and the manner in which it was handled.

Cutting and Fitting.

First, they found an andante movement which didn't jibe with the scene in which it occurred. It was cut out—and it didn't hurt the selection a bit; on the other hand, its elimination helped the musical accompaniment to the picture.

Second, the allegro finale came to an end right in the most interesting part of the scene—in a place where music was needed if anywhere. Instead of stopping "biff-bang-ta-da-a-a" as is so often the case, these gentlemen simply kept it going until the picture showed a legitimate reason for stopping.

It Looks Easy

though really it takes considerable thought and care. Constant practice along these lines will develop a facility for choosing and "pruning" numbers from your library, though we will admit there is required a certain instinct for dramatic values in their relation to musical expression. Probably the modus operandi in this case was something like this: Fake a waltz and look at the picture—nothing doing in particular—seems to call for neutral music—not too slow—doesn't have to be lively—(Mr. Lyons instructs his agents) action begins—stock exchange—music begins to work up—a "hurry" would be too melo-dramatic—body of an overture ought to answer—pathetic scenes shown in the beads of necklace, but scene on stock exchange predominates—keep up agitated music—ballroom—change to waltz. Then allegretto; widow comes to plead—andante, music, etc. Having "doped it out," he chooses his program for the next show.

The Principal Motive

in this picture relates to the stock exchange, and the principal descriptive music follows the scenes in the market. The allegro of a standard overture suggests itself, but the average overture includes usually a long andante out of keeping with the first part of the picture. We might play neutral stuff until these scenes occur, then jump to the allegro chosen, and continue that until the dance scene. Mr. King, however, chose the selection mentioned which consists mostly of moderato movements, cut out the inconsistent andante and made the finale last until the dance scene. It was good work.

"The Photoplayer"

Carrie Hetherington, the photoplayer expert, writes:

> Am taking the liberty to write to you regarding music for the picture, not by manual playing nor by orchestra, but by the new invention called the "Photoplayer." This instrument is composed of piano, reed-organ, pipe-organ, chimes, orchestral bells and all necessary drummers' traps; is played by regular 88-note player rolls, but has two separate tracker boards which enables the operator to make the quick changes without stopping the music. An expert operator can follow the picture so closely as to make a photoplay almost talk.
> With your permission I shall enclose my program for the Biograph release, "Judith of Bethulia," and hope that all theaters having the "photoplayer" will try it and that the operators of such will work up the music with the acting and demonstrate the effect of correct music as can be exemplified by this instrument.

Here follows the musical program to:

Judith of Bethulia.

Open with "Maritana," by Wallace, until Judith in prayer; then "The Rosary," by Nevin, until she leaves woman with child; then back to "Maritana" until "The Army." Then: "William Tell" (by Rossini) the last movement. Play this to end of roll, then "Pique Dame" overture (Suppe) all through. Then "Poet and Peasant" overture (Suppe) until: "Water and Food Famine."—"Simple Aveau" (Thome) until "The King." Then "Peer Gynt"—Suite II opus 55 (Greig) until Judith has vision—then "Woodland Sketchs 1 and 2" (McDowell) until she puts on fine clothes. Then: "Lament of Roses" (Sounakolb) until "The King." "Peer Gynt" suite II, opus 55 until end of reel.

The Third Reel

starts with "Lament of Rose"—play until Judith before King. Then "A Day in Venice" (Nevin) once through; then "Lament of Rose" again until "Dash for Water."—"Fallow Field Hunt" (Swift) once through. Then last movement of "William Tell" until Judith in Tent Alone. Then "Moonlight Sonata" (Beethoven) until title: "Judith Battles with Herself, etc." Then "Prelude opus 28" (Chopin) until Judith before King.—"Scarf Dance" (Chaminade) N. B. It is necessary to have two rolls of "Scarf Dance" to last out. Play until Judith's Handmaid alone (large picture); then: "Young Nun" (Schubert) until Judith raises knife to kill; back to "Scarf Dance" until famine scene—city. Then "Simple Aveu" until back to Judith. "Young Nun" again until City. "William Tell" (first movement) until title: "Without Their Prince, etc." Then "Poet and Peasant" until people kneel in prayer; then: "Priest's March from Athalia" (Mendelssohn) until end.

I will say by way of explanation to those who may be unfamiliar with the instrument that the "Photoplayer" has facilities for two rolls of music—one can be playing while the other is being adjusted.

The performer can change instantly from one roll to the other and back again at will. The writer has not indicated the conclusion of the first or third reels in the above picture, though I fancy this can make little or no difference to one wishing to follow her program.

Want to Find Some Music Rolls.

Craig Brothers, of the Bells Amusement Company, Bells, Texas, want the address of the manufacturer of roll music for "The Staufer-Glynn Double Roll Rewind Automatic Electric Piano." Up to the present writing I have been unable to learn the whereabouts of this company. Perhaps some of our readers may be able and willing to answer the query. If so, a favor will be conferred by communicating with the Craig Brothers as per above address.

Music for Features.

L. F. W., Minneapolis, Minn., writes:

> I am about to take a position in another city as musical director (orchestra of six) in a picture theater. I understand they show a great many multiple reel features. Can you tell me if these have special music arranged for them, and how and where could I get it?

Write to your exchange. They should be able to give you all information regarding their service.

Moving Picture Educator

A Good Picture for Boys to See.

A RECENT Biograph release entitled, "Gentleman or Thief," has as one of the strong characters, a newsboy, whose sterling sense of honesty is a splendid example to boys, and the picture may be shown with this special emphasis that boys will be benefited by seeing it. A "gentleman" who is familiar in the card rooms of the clubs, where if he loses he must necessarily seek dishonest means of making good his losses and to equip himself for further gambling, is looked upon by the newsboy as being a thorough gentleman, instead of the "Rafiles" he really is. After robbing a safe—"Raffles" is nearly caught by the police—while escaping he runs into his boy admirer, who offers him the shelter of his humble lodging, thereby enabling him to elude his followers. When the boy tells him that the danger is past "Raffles" offers the boy money for his aid, the boy, however, now understands the situation and refuses with disdain. "Raffles" then offers to shake hands with him, but to his surprise the boy says "I don't shake hands with thieves." Thus stung to the quick, he slinks out of the boy's humble room. Smarting under the boy's rebuke, "Raffles" decides to return the stolen money, notice of which appears in the papers. Upon reading this the boy seems to realize what may have brought about such a course. "Raffles" now seeks out the boy and tells him of his determination to begin life again honestly under his influence. While the strength of the picture lies in the sterling qualities of the boy, it might have been worked to a better conclusion. The way in which they start off in the world together is unnatural and weak; a little care would have much improved this picture and raised its otherwise good qualities higher.

Pathe's Weekly.

This picture newspaper continues to maintain its high standard. Not having reviewed it for some time, it is a pleasure to notice its consistent character and regularity. Of chief interest in the last issue is the new king of a new country—Albania, who seems to be commencing his reign under favorable yet watchful conditions. The King of England is shown as an interested spectator of the American baseball players, with Ambassador Page explaining the rules of the game to him. Bullet-proof aeroplanes are now the latest thing in aviation, and speed enthusiasts have pictures of automobiles traveling at nearly eighty miles an hour, and with a new French torpedo bicycle going still faster. The latest blizzard is made historical by good views, and storm and tempest's powerful results in all parts of the world are recorded. Views of American warships in Mexican waters show this county's careful waiting policy, with every evidence of readiness and safety.

The Hunting Spider.

In connection with a recent article descriptive of the works of Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of the New York Zoological Society, it is well to notice that Pathé's has just produced under his supervision a reel of "Hunting-Spiders." Among these spiders is shown the vicious tarantula of South America, which kills insects, small birds and reptiles. It belongs to a group of hunting-spiders that spin no web, but stalk their prey. Frequently these poisonous insects are found in bunches of bananas. Other specimens shown are found in Texas and California. The Lycasa, or wolf spider, is found in the eastern parts of the United States and is a savage hunter, being well known on account of its frequent appearances on bodies of fresh water. The Pathe Company has also a new list of scenics as follows: "The Picturesque Coast of Catalonia," "A Trip to the Great Nile Dam," "Rambles in Bourges, France," "Monuments of Upper Egypt," "Scenes Along the Canvery River, India," and "A Typical Buddhist Temple."

The Edison Company has a very timely release in "A Winter Holiday in Bernese Oberland, Switzerland." Located in the very heart of Switzerland, noted for its clear pure air, and for the splendor of its mountain scenery, the views are of bewitching beauty. An exhibition of cross-country skiing by two experts is given at the end of the reel.

Signs of Progress.

Music is receiving extraordinary attention in the moving-picture theaters of today. To have such a combination as the Hope-Jones organ is one of the greatest strides possible. Such an organ in connection with the Wurlitzer is now installed in the Vitagraph Theater in New York. This means that in all the marvelous progress in kinematographic exhibitions the musical part has kept pace with the screen. It seems but a short time since it was necessary to be constantly assailing the loud military drum which proved such a nuisance in most theaters.

Happily that is an instrument of the past; it has gone with the crude pictures, and the unmusical exhibitor, surely never to return. The old piano picked up in a second-hand auction is now also relegated to the rear; the latest type of modern organ is none too good to accompany the class of pictures now being shown.

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projecting machines have been installed in the State Epileptic Colony at Abilene, Texas, the State Lunatic Asylum at Austin, Texas, and the State Orphan Home at Corsicana, Texas. These machines were sold through the General Film Company, of Dallas, Texas.

The United States battleship "Vermont," one of the most powerful in the navy, has been equipped with a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projection machine. The United States Government is having motion picture machines installed in practically all of the army posts and on battleships for the amusement and education of the soldiers and sailors, and this no doubt will increase the number of recruits in the service.

In the Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburg, Pa., the steel business is being taught by means of a series of films entitled "From Iron Ore to Finished Steel." The pictures show the ore mine "Hull-Rust" in the Mesaba district of Minnesota, the largest ore mine in the world. The digging of ore by gigantic steam shovels, and loading on great freighters at Duluth, and again the unloading at Conneaut, O. The product is then followed to the United States Steel Corporation mills at Farrell, Pa., when every process of steel making is most vividly portrayed. The films which are taken by the Farrell Film Company are described as being of exceptional educational value; as besides showing steel making they also show the various processes of the by-products, coke plants and many other accessories.

From Salt Lake City, Utah, comes the information that moving pictures have been installed in the high school for the practical study of scientific subjects. The principal of the school says he has made arrangements for the purchase of films depicting animal life through all its stages, together with those showing the growing of plants. Films to illustrate the principles of physical geography, the elemental phases of geology and the study of natural history are also secured; the school authorities find that study by moving picture is easier and more direct, while they believe the chief value lies in the increased interest shown among the students.

Domestic Science by moving pictures will surely bring the value of kinematography right in the home, as an auxiliary to its uses in the pure food campaign it should prove invaluable. Miss Grauel, president of the Housewives' League of Cleveland, is the first person to add moving pictures to the stereopticon slide to illustrate her lectures. Beginning at Toledo she is giving a series of lectures which are intended to be of unusual interest to the woman at the head of the home and to the mother of the family. There is no doubt that in so general and valuable a study as domestic science the pictures will be a great aid.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THAT motion picture exhibitors cannot be too careful in making announcements to and dealing with the public is exemplified by claim for an award made upon the management of the Savoy Theater on 34th Street. It appears that the management flashes an announcement between pictures that it will give $500 to anyone who can say the pictures shown have been seen before. In justice to the management it should be stated that the claim hinges upon the wording of the offer and not because the management does not give the public what it advertises. The theater runs licensed films. Under the licensed system all films are shipped to out-of-town exchanges in time to give all subjects their first run on the same date throughout the United States and Canada, wherever first run service is used. Evidently the Savoy management did not take this into consideration and the claimant has asked for the $500 because a subject he saw presented in a Philadelphia theater one morning was shown upon the screen of the Savoy in the evening of the same date. The claimant is ready to produce proof of his claim, even to the extent of producing people who were with him in the Philadelphia theater, all of which is unnecessary so far as it may go to show that it was possible for him to see a subject in the Quaker City and this city on the same day. Ample proof of this can be presented right here with the co-operation of the shippers of the film. The main question is: Is the Savoy management guilty of bad faith, or misrepresentation? In a general sense it is not. Technically, it has rendered itself liable to the claim because care had not been taken in framing the announcement. This oversight was no doubt due to zeal attending an effort to convince the public that the house does produce first runs. The announcement should have been that the award would be made to anyone who could prove that the subjects had been shown in any theater prior to that particular date. Undoubtedly the management will make a change in the slide without delay. If the change is not made the managers may be overwhelmed by technical claimants. People "who have seen any of the pictures before" may include those who attended earlier exhibitions at the house on the same day, or even those who saw them at preliminary runs before they were sent to exchanges, or exhibitors.

Reference to the matter is not made here to either uphold or decry the claim made upon the Savoy; but simply to impress upon all exhibitors the importance of exercising the greatest care in preparing announcements of their attractions. The public is severely technical and takes advantage against motion picture houses upon the slightest pretext.

And this thought leads us to a point where we are forced to the conclusion that a new and lucrative field has been found by sharpers among motion picture exhibitors. No less than a score of reports have been received during the past week to the effect that exhibitors have been victimized by bogus salesmen of premiums and bad check manipulators. Annoyed by repeated demands made upon it by people in the business and hotels to make good on checks floated by swindlers, one of the foremost producing companies in the country has felt obliged to liberally advertise a warning to exhibitors throughout the country to be on the watch for the crooks. While the subject is being given wide-spread attention let the exhibitors at the same time guard themselves against the smooth-tongued representatives who resort to all kinds of ruses to get bookings for film subjects, regardless of their character or quality. Fliers in sensations bring returns for but a day and the impressions left behind may kill the business of an exhibitor for weeks, or perhaps longer. The promoters of such ventures are not classified as crooks, but successful operation of their schemes results in far more loss than the crook brings. A bad film subject is much worse than a bad check. The latter may deprive a manager of his receipts for an entire day, but woe to the box office of a house that receives a black eye from a bad film. Put the bad films out of circulation.

Sharp as the competition is among the numerous film producing interests the heartiest sympathy was extended to the Eclair Film Company, which sustained a loss of about $300,000 through destruction of its plant by fire last week. If there is anything film manufacturers dread it is fire. In no other line of business does it bring more real financial loss. The loss is absolute. There is so chance to recuperate any of it through "fire sale," "damaged goods bargains," or other methods left open to the commercial people. People not in touch with the business have no conception of what fire in a studio and factory means to the owners.

During a discussion of the Eclair fire in a hotel lobby a commercial traveller remarked that the estimates of losses sustained by such fires were ridiculous. "Why," said he, "such plants are mere shells and the cost of their construction is a bagatelle compared with the cost of a factory in the commercial line. A newspaper states that in this Eclair Company fire there were over $300,000 worth of films destroyed. That is preposterous. I am not in the picture business and take only the words of the people who are, to show you how absurd such an estimate is. They tell us these pictures sell at about $100 a thousand feet. Now that amount, plus 3,000 makes 300,000, doesn't it? Do you mean to tell me that company had 3,000 films in their vaults? And nothing is said about the insurance."

There are many people who entertain the same thoughts as those expressed by the salesman just quoted; but, like him, they may be converted to reason by a few facts. There are two kinds of films—negatives and positives. A surprising number of people imagine that the picture made by the camera is the one that is projected upon the screen. They do not realize that to get a picture upon the screen the manufacturer (upon a much larger scale, of course) follows the same process as the ordinary photographer. If the Eclair losses were confined to the destruction of positives, a source of some recuperation would be afforded by ability to make new prints from the negatives saved. It is true that positives sell at about $100 per thousand feet, but the same quality of negative for the same subject may be worth thousands of dollars. In these days of advancement in the production of photoplays $5,000 is a small amount of actual outlay in the preparation of a subject, particularly when there are from two to eight reels. In the latter case the expense may run to six, or even ten, times that amount. The greatest loss comes when negatives have just been completed, or one made up for advance trade, before the positives have been made, or the time has arrived to market them. In such an event all the labor of weeks, or perhaps months, must be gone over again and all the money required for salaries, cost of scenery, props, costumes and effects, must be spent again, in addition to the cost of printing and developing the new negatives. Besides this must be figured the mechanical part of the plants, which include machines used in the production of the films, carpenter shop, scenic and costume departments, power plant and many other departments that cannot be replaced without enormous outlay of both capital and labor. People who base their estimates of the amount of money invested in the production of motion pictures upon observations made in the exhibiting houses have but a faint idea of the actual investment. Their estimates are made, as a rule, solely upon the number of people and the amount and character of scenery and costumes reflected by the picture; and their estimates of returns to the manufacturers on each subject are based upon the supposition that there are from 8,000 to 10,000 exhibition houses in the United States that the manufacturer supplies at $100 each. Their ideas are as logical one way as the other. Of one thing they appear confident, and that is the motion picture business is a mint for all concerned in it. Revenues, and not investment and expense, appear to be their sole consideration. Here is a problem for some of the incredulous to solve: If it costs $20,000 to put up an up-to-date picture theater, what will be the cost to establish a modern picture producing plant? When they reach the solution they will have some knowledge of what they know about the business. As to the insurance proposition, all consideration of it is barred by the fact that insurance rates on motion picture studios are prohibitive.

So the censorship bug has at last reached the halls of Congress! What is known as the "Christian Lobby" is the sponsor for the latest movement. Well, the argument made last week in these columns against State censorship holds good against the Congressional movement. The United States Court of Ohio has before it a test of constitutionality of the censorship question and there is now reason why action by either State or National legislators should force the matter until the United States Supreme Court has had an opportunity to pass upon the question. If it sustains the contention that censorship is unconstitutional all that the State bodies and Congress have done, or may do, will have been a waste of time and the people's money. Agitators who persist in face of these facts make themselves appear recklessly zealous. In support of the movement the agitators quote Judge Swann, of New York, as saying: "I have had a great many young people of both sexes tell me that they got their first suggestion to commit crime from scenes portrayed in motion pictures." Yes, and the same story has been told to other judges. Hundreds of them have also told their parents they were at picture shows to conceal their attendance at dance halls and questionable resorts. The worst sensational melo-drama was never saddled with any of this responsibility, nor do the so-called reformers turn their attention in that direction.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Honesty and Safeguards.

UNDOUBTEDLY in a business employing more than a hundred thousand persons there must be some few who are dishonest. We have evaded discussion of this point in the department heretofore, but the requests for some suggestions as to how to safeguard the interests of the management are growing. We are going to take up the matter to the best of our ability and then let it drop again unless some correspondent has something to offer in addition. Perhaps this letter gives the best summary of the situation:

> I made up my mind to one thing, and that is that I could just as well be on the job every minute and see that we got all the money coming to us as well to believe that we did. Do you get me? Well, anyway I found out that we were being done somewhere and it had to quit. There is only one way when such things appear true—clean house and let the innocent suffer with the guilty. We did that thing and are doing much better now and I hope will continue to do so. Let me ask you—is there no way you can run a theater and be absolutely sure that you are not being done. Turnstiles mean a large lobby but it seems to me that there is no other way. Anyone I put at the door can get away with it either by slipping tickets back to the ticket seller for resale and splitting up the profits or by letting personal friends in for five cents. Then if the manager wants to he can steal you blind in a dozen ways. You probably will say that it is easily stopped, but it can't be true until you are able to eliminate the personal equation. I put our problem up to several men who know our house ard no one can solve it. Between us I want to tell you that we got it good and plenty. The physical manager of the house employed his two sons—both wild youths—as ushers. The boys took tickets and I think worked the pass-back game with the ticket seller. The manager could not know this. I got wise by watching carefully and going up into the operator's booth and counting the house. Many nights with a house full and a hundred people standing I would go up there and count the vacant seats. You know most of them will stand until there are two seats together and so even if there are a number standing there may be a dozen vacant seats in the house, but all singles. Well, the next day our report might show $30.00. The house full would be $45.50. Allow fifty five-cent seats and even then there is a discrepancy. Then the boys would keep the tickets or get them in some way and pay for their games in the pool halls with them and the proprietor would sell them cheap. It didn't do any good to change color on them for they took tickets at the door. Well just for that they all had to get out. Of course that game is killed, but I can't stand at the door all the time and see that there is no crooked work going on, and the man I have there may start a little game of his own and it is up to me to catch him. How can you make the thing "crook proof"? There are so many things to be taken into consideration—such as the police laws and fire laws and the lobby room and standing room that all have a direct bearing upon the case and alter the situation with the individual house. Our house comes right to the sidewalk and there is a lobby with a storm front right at the sidewalk. The lobby is not over twelve feet wide and there are three entrances or exits from the house into the lobby. The entrance is near the ticket office at the right, but some nights when the inside standing room is filled and the lobby is full and they are packed twenty deep clear into the street it is a job getting them all in any one place. Let the doors open anywhere for people to exit and there is a rush. I can't use ropes, as it is against a local ordinance.

Can't Be Done.

About the only way to absolutely prevent theft is to sell and take tickets and sleep in the theater nights. The best that can be done is to keep the losses to a minimum.

The turnstile is no absolute safeguard. There must be an exit as well as the entrance, and if the ticket taker and seller are in partnership there is nothing to prevent the doorkeeper telling a patron that the turnstile is out of order and to go in the other way. Then the ticket is snapped back into the cashier to be used again. If both the ticket seller and ticket taker are honest there is nothing to prevent the usher from letting a few in from the side entrances, and most houses do have these side entrances. Where a majority of the house enters in a limited time the turnstile that the manager or a trusted agent watches is perhaps the best preventive, but it is not an absolute preventive even then. There used to be a house in a Jersey town that had eight doors, and when all of these were watched the local manager would take people into the house through the stage and the box door.

In a majority of the houses the turnstile is prohibited by the local fire laws and where the law does not prohibit them common sense should. Even in the mildest panic the turnstile is fatal. It cannot be taken up and out of the way in time. It should be dismissed from any consideration.

Given a reliable ticket seller, the automatic ticket machine that makes a hidden record of all tickets sold is the next best idea. This will not prevent the doorkeeper from passing in a few friends, but any marked discrepancy will be noted almost immediately.

Get a Counter.

In connection with this or any other idea there is a little device known as a pole counter or automatic tally. It will run up to 99 or 999 by a simple pressure on the plunger. One of the best known managers in the country, operating a chain of houses, carries one of these. We swung over a part of the circuit with him once and night after night as he sat in the box we could hear the "clicker" going. Count up the house and look at the box office count and you can soon tell if you are being victimized.

One of the large Coney Island amusement companies reads all cash registers every hour all day long. It has a system of records going back ten or fifteen years giving the day of the week, the weather and other data. If any register shows a falling off from a corresponding day the previous year and this discrepancy is consistent, there is an investigation, allowance being made for weather conditions. Such a little thing as a thunderstorm at five o'clock should show a gain in the restaurant takings, for instance, but a loss at seven and perhaps eight.

This is almost too elaborate for a smaller enterprise, but it is well to note the average of the house and investigate any gain or falling off. If the average Friday shows fifteen dollars between three and five in the afternoon, the weather being good, and suddenly drops to ten and stays at ten, while the house seems as full as usual, it might be well to investigate.

Making such records from the hidden indicators is about the safest scheme. These records may be made by the ticket cashier or the manager. No particular machine is recommended. Any machine dispensing tickets direct to the purchaser will do. It will not wholly check the doorkeeper, but it will hold his possible stealings down, always provided that the doorman and cashier do not pool their interests.

Strip tickets are less certain, but reasonably reliable, particularly if one of the numbered tickets is held out every hour. Provide a number of small pay envelopes. The first is for the first ticket taken in, the second for an hour or two hours later and so on until the last gives the final ticket on the day. If more than one price is used, take one of each.

Watch the Door.

If you have reason to believe that the doorkeeper is passing too many of his friends in, get a couple of bright young women to visit the house. One can be waiting for a friend in the lobby, and keeping an eye on the doorman, the other entering the house and counting up the people as they enter. If sixty come in and the ticket return shows fifty-four, someone got sixty cents and the doorman should know something about it.

But don't make your people feel that they are under suspicion. Nothing so tends to destroy loyalty as a constant system of watching. We used to know a house where the doorman took a pride in stealing simply because it was taken for granted that he was a thief and he was made to feel that it was a game between himself and the manager as to who got the money.

The taking of tickets and using them over again is one of the common tricks, but the use of a "chopper" that will properly mutilate the ticket will help some. The patron drops the ticket in the box and the chopper does the rest, but the strip ticket is to be had at any exchange or direct from the printer, few are specially printed and it is easy to get the same tickets as the genuine rolls.

Cash registers can be adapted to print a ticket and by the use of a peculiar tint of paper it will not be easy to counterfeit them. The cashier asked for five ten-cent tickets, merely punches the fifty-cent key and the ticket is passed out with fifty cents stamped on it. Where but one price ticket is used this is a simple scheme and cheaper than some form of machine that delivers ready printed tickets. In this case use quick drying ink. It is hard on the type where any part of the stamp is rubber, but there are no soiled gloves.

Cultivate Loyalty.

Any self-registering device is a good check, but there must be some dependence placed on the house employees. It is better to cultivate a sense of loyalty than to hire detectives, and cheaper in the long run. Where several houses are run in a circuit and there must be a paid manager to each, it is better to divide the responsibility between two or three than to center it on one person on the general proposition that if three people each steal their share of five dollars a day there is less return, and therefore less temptation, than if one person could get the entire sum, and there is less chance that all will be willing to be dishonest.

In any case the so-called "hard" tickets should not be used. In the regular houses nine-tenths of the juggling is done with hard tickets and the same holds good in picture theaters. The best safeguard where reserved seats are used is to count the "deadwood," the tickets left in the rack after any performance, but it is so seldom that reserved seats are used that this is hardly available.

Most holdouts are based on the understanding that a certain number of tickets are to be turned back at each performance. This is not possible where the tickets are shot from a machine almost into the customer's hands. It is for this reason that the automatic machine is to be preferred, but a heavy holdout is almost certain to be noticed if persisted in, and so the tally is, after all, the best check.

Does anyone know a better?

Gosh!

We never thought we would live to see it, but the Martz, the house organ of the same name in Tipton, Ind., says it gives only three complete shows an evening and that the way to get a full entertainment is to go to one of the other theaters, as well. We do not believe that the three houses are under the same management, and it takes a broad gauge management to advertise the other fellow even when he says to come to the Martz first and then go to the other fellow.

Another novel announcement is that the manager of the Martz has moved his law offices to the theater to be in closer touch with his theatrical enterprise.

The Martz is a four pager and most of the matter is readers instead of set advertisements; a better form where the matter can be well written, as in this case.

Coming Along.

Julian Solomon, Jr., in the Susquehanna Theater, Philadelphia, is building up his News into a readable locality sheet; one that will be looked for instead of being kicked off the door step unread. From the looks of the advertising pages it must be paying its own way right now.

Cut Out Slides.

The Arcade Theater, Gooding, Idaho, offers a new idea in cut-out slides, sending this letter:

> Being a regular reader of your publication and having been benefited a number of times by putting into practice "other people's ideas" as published in your paper I feel that it is possible and only right that I should reciprocate.
> I am inclosing herewith three "slides" to illustrate our method of advertising. As we all know, something different always appeals, attracts attention, and thereby brings results. Results are what we all want. I have found that these "cut out" slides reach more of the people and convey the idea, or the object of the slide, to the minds of the people quicker, better, and more indelibly for the reason that they see the form of the object that is being advertised.
> Of course in some cases it is not possible to use the "cut out" idea but wherever it is possible I can vouch for the statement that it is good advertising and I believe better than any other form of slide, the pictorial slide not excepted.
> I hope that you can use these slides to somebody's benefit.

The slides are done on the usual lantern slide plates of clear glass, the cut-out being made on scale paper, probably for the familiar reduction by squares. One slide, advertising the coming of "Arizona," is lettered in an outline of that state, the general outline being preserved though the proportions are incorrect, being too low for the width. This is not a point that will occur to many, and some such reduction was necessary in order to get the screen proportions. Another slide announces circus night, the outline of a charging buffalo being cut out of the paper and the lettering being done within this space. A third, an advertising slide for a soda fountain, advertises hot drinks within the outline of a glass with steam rising from the same. As A. J. Schubert says, anything different will attract attention. This is a decidedly good idea. If you cannot make the reductions by the square method you can at least use a pantograph. If you cannot even handle this save up pictures and use tracing paper or trace with a stylus and a carbon sheet.

Moved.

D. L. Cornelius, who is now in Shreeveport, La., sends this letter:

> My last contribution to your department was "THE DOOR-KNOB SPECIAL," the weekly door-knob advance program which I sent you from Monroe, La.—now I pop up from another town which is considerably larger and The Door-knob Special is impossible here, therefore I am forced to make my weekly house organ a program.
> I am inclosing my last edition and trust that it meets with your approval as some of my other efforts have.
> I carry, as you will notice, the programs for two theaters, the Hippodrome and Dreamland, having just recently started the program for the Dreamland. Now I am undecided as to whether to change the name of the program and name it something that would be in common or not. What would you advise?

By All Means.

His new submission is the Hippodrome Herald. As it is numbered 42, it may be surmised that it was running when Mr. Cornelius took charge. Most assuredly the name should be changed to something that covers both houses. In default of a more suitable single name it might be given

THE PROGRAM
HIPPODROME — — — DREAMLAND

In this case the names of the houses should be almost as pronounced as the title, though the words "The Program" should be larger to follow the rule that a sub-title cannot be larger than the main line. To get around this the top line might be set in shaded letters and the names of the houses in a bold lower case. There is a tendency on the part of many to order the house name in all capitals, but this is a mistake. A lower case letter is more easily read. If Mr. Cornelius will compare the lines on pages eight and nine of the copy sent us, he will be able to get the idea. More than this, the lower case will permit the use of an "extended" letter where a "condensed" face might be required for all capitals.

The program is a twenty page issue, mostly with running stories of coming films. There is but one page of "house talk" and one page of miscellaneous matter. On the latter page we notice a couple of rather loud jokes. They are not very bad, but they are somewhat out of place in an issue that goes into the family circle. Father may laugh at them, but the real appeal is made to mother and the children. There is plenty of clean humor to be taken up. We are inclined to think that more space given to general matter, most of it having at least an indirect bearing on the films, will prove to be better than the exhaustive treatment of coming stories. It is not so much what is printed as what is read that counts. Give them more of what they want to read and they will read more of what you wish them to read.

We are not very strong for program jokes at best. Much humor is out of place in a house organ. There is plenty of general press matter with a humorous side that would be much better.

Aid the Spotlight.

And the Spotlight, the organ of the Fichtenberg enterprises in New Orleans, also has a signed humorous page that might as well have been written with a pair of scissors. It is an advertisement for a comedian at present playing the houses, but it is not a particularly good advertisement and the space might be better employed.

The last issue gives a very pretty effect with two-color cover work, the red and black giving excellent results, much the same as the covers of Real Life. The Spotlight has made consistent improvement of late, but it still needs to give readable matter to cover its advertising readers.

That Hero Contest.

An anonymous writer complains that the Hero Contest of the Ladies' World was not started on a fair basis, as there are but two independent candidates against five on the licensed side. It may interest the writer, whoever he may be, to know that the list was carefully compiled from a complete list of leading men and without regard as to whether they were playing for the licensed or independent companies. The Ladies' World has nothing to do with trade affiliations and every effort was made to have the list truly representative. G. M. Anderson would not enter, but apart from him we believe that the list gives the seven most popular men in the photoplays. It was not a question of whether the contestant was a licensed or independent player but whether he was more popular than any of those left out and we do not believe that the list could be improved upon. The writer also says that Mr. Matt, manager of the Della Theater, Flint, Mich., is exchanging tickets for votes and says that the attention the contest is drawing will more than bring back the investment of tickets. If this is the case we fail to see where he has grounds for complaint.

Improved.

The Rex Theater, Valley City, N. D., sends in an improved program. It retains its rather too great length since it is argued by the management that the public is now accustomed to the shape of the sheet, which is in a measure true. The program is much better displayed, but we think that they would not hurt the looks of things if they slightly changed the layout. Now the program rises to the top of the page with three inch and a quarter ads below. Putting one of the three on top and sinking the program to that extent will not detract from the program and it will get two more of the advertisers "next to pure reading" and make them feel they are getting more for their money. Also, if they will frame the program in three point rule or three on six point border, they will be surprised and pleased. The back page is given to readable items about coming attractions and the house. They make each line count. The heading: "Weekly chat of the Rex and its Actors and Actresses," gives a sort of proprietary air to the whole licensed service and the state rights people. It makes the patron feel that he patronizes a house with a stock company of thousands.

A Bohemian.

The Bohemian, the organ of the Bohemia Theater, Cleveland, Tenn., is a four page paper 11 by 14 inches. It gives straight run story of coming films in leaded twelve point. It makes a rather white sheet, but it is easy to read, though a ten point or, better still, an eight, leaded would make it look more like a paper. It would greatly increase composition cost, but the size of the sheet might be profitably cut down to match and the same amount of reading matter given on half the paper with a general effect of compactness that is now lacking. The back page is given to Universal press matter. There should be a little something said about the house each week. Apart from the title and the underline "Published weekly by the Bohemia Theater," there is not a line advertising the house. This is a mistake.

Some Stunt.

Melvin G. Winstock, who got out of the People's Amusement Company, Portland, Oregon, to get a free hand for his ideas, is doing a noved stunt in advertising a house not yet built on the principle, that by the time it is built it will be as well known as though it had been opened some months. It will seat 2,000 persons. It takes money, but it makes money. He says he is not going to die again, but is going to keep sending in stuff.

Not Even Comedy.

SINCE last report Mrs. Parsons of the Essanay company has built up her comedy string until now there is an opening only for the very best. If you don't write the very best sort of stuff, it is utterly foolish to enrich a paternal government by sending scripts to Essanay with from two to four cents each way. If you want to help out the postal deficit, go ahead, but if you want to sell, send to some place where there is a market.

Closed For the Present.

Richard V. Spencer, editor for the New York Motion Picture Company, writes that at present they are overstocked. Nothing is wanted for Kay-Bee, Broncho, Domino.

Note that he does not say that Keystone is overstocked. Perhaps comedies in synopsis form are desired. He does not say they are, but he does not say they are not. We are inclined to think that anything that measures up to Mack Sennett's idea of humor will be snapped up. He prefers a complete but not overfull synopsis. He pays synopsis price.

Mr. Spencer says the stop order is for "the next few months."

On the Other Hand.

The American Company announces that it is particularly interested in scripts adapted for comedies or light dramas for the use of the Beauty Company. They will pay "liberal" prices and Mr. Nehl's ideas of liberal prices do not hover in the vicinity of seven dollars and a half. Liberal with him means regular money. Make your local house show some Beauties and then start in to fill the demand—if you can. They want only the best.

Send to the Chicago offices, 6227 Evanston Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

No!

A correspondent, building up on Mr. Wells' suggestion of a scene to a page in the practice script, suggests that the script be sent to the editor with a scene to a page "almost in book form."

The correspondent is very evidently not familiar with production methods. The more compact the script, provided that it is understandable, the better. Send the finished work on 8½ by 11 paper and no other.

As to That.

Several correspondents have asked information as to the interview with Frank E. Woods, of the Reliance, recently appearing in Reel Life and other publications, in which he argues in favor of synopsis alone.

This was a story written by a singularly good press agent from what must have been a very brief interview. All that it really means is that "Spec" will pay a better price than most for synopsis only. But Mr. Woods speaks for the four Mutual brands he supervises and for no others and his opinions on synopses are of value only as you may wish to do business with him. We are rather ashamed of some of the letters we have had in which the writers argue that they should stop writing scripts and seek to sell by synopsis.

On the other hand, Lawrence S. McCloskey, in commenting on an inquiry we recently made on behalf of a writer who had sent him a synopsis wrote, in effect: "Men who can write full action should not seek to sell by synopsis. If they have ideas and we want to buy them, it is all there and we can buy. We can't tell from the synopsis if the action would be good, and we prefer full action to synopsis only."

There is a growing tendency on the part of some writers to submit synopses only with an offer to send the full script if the synopsis pleases. This is foolish and fatal to success. No honest-to-goodness-making-a-living-at-it writer ever does that. He does not send an empty box to see if you like what it contains, and the synopsis, no matter how full, never gives much idea of the action.

An Object Lesson.

Here is a little object lesson in writing scripts.

About twenty-five years ago the then Commissioner of Police of New York City went out to see if the patrolmen were doing their duty. He found one man in a saloon, but before he could get his number, all the Commissioner had was the vanished patrolman's club. That wasn't much, but the Commissioner went over to the station house, figuring that the man who came off beat without his club would be the one he had caught in the saloon. Relief came and the relieved platoon came in. Not a single man had his club. Since then the clubs have carried the owner's shield number.

Now look at the possibilities of this story for a picture in the present mode. What are its chances?

The Patrolman is in the saloon.

He runs away.

The commissioner finds the club.

The patrolman is seen urging others to throw away their clubs.

On relief no man has his club.

There is only one laugh there, that in the last scene where the men all come in without clubs. There is nothing funny in the sight of Jim Jones asking Sam Smith and Ben Black and Will White to throw away their clubs. The idea might be funny, but it is action, plus the idea, that counts in comedy. Something must be done to make this funny action if it is a story. Now watch.

The Chief announces that any man caught in a saloon will be fired from the force.

Jim Jones, a married man, goes into a saloon for a drink.

The Chief finds him there and blacks his eye.

Before the Chief gets a clear identification Jones knocks the Chief down. He runs away.

Later he returns and the barkeeper tells him that the Chief has said he will know the delinquent by his black eye.

Jones meets his wife and tells her his troubles.

His wife spends the afternoon blackening the eyes of all the other policemen she meets.

The Chief goes to the station.

By the time Jones gets in, black eyed policemen are so common that they do not even notice his.

Now there is a laugh, two laughs, in fact, where the Chief gives the black eye and is knocked down. There is a laugh each time a policeman has his eye blacked. There is a big laugh at the finish.

Watch for Lubin's "The Eyes Have It." This was the evolution of the story, the translation of idea into idea AND action.

How About It?

Some four or five months ago we got a whole bundle of letters from Pittsburg lamenting that there was no Inquest Circle there, so we coaxed Edward W. Matlack, a Kalem star writer, to start a circle and not a single solitary individual sent in for the address of the circle. Now here is one last chance. Write in and we'll pass the letters on to Mr. Matlack. If enough come in, he will form the circle with the aid of Frank Howard Clark. If they ran a school and charged $20 a course they would be overrun with pupils, but because it doesn't cost a penny, the advice of a couple of real writers seems to be scorned.

Two Coroners.

As soon as the new franchise for Kansas City was issued, the old Coroner sat up and began to take notice. He has not the time to give to it and so will be content to aid the new Coroner. The point is that there will be a live circle in Kansas City. Get in it.

Lloyd Lonergan.

Almost since the formation of the Thanhouser Company, Lloyd Lonergan has written practically all of the Thanhouser releases; not by merely putting his name to the script he revises, but digging out the idea, getting it on paper and generally cutting the film afterward. We are inclined to think that he has written more produced plays than any single photoplay writer and his batting average runs about 980. He has kept on year after year, turning out two or three a week and yet never letting the suggestion creep into his stuff that it is machine made. He doesn't write the same story this week that he wrote week before last and is going to write again week after next. He doesn't run his ideas around in a ring like the ponies in a circus. He makes them as different as possible and gives to the Thanhouser releases a diversity that is lacking in some companies where the work of scores of writers are done over into the same mold by an editing Editor. He has the trick (for it is a trick, developed by practice) of seeing a plot theme in the commonest happening of life. He takes some simple little incident and makes it unusual by skilled treatment until, if you knew the source of inspiration, you would scarcely be able to recognize the play as being derived from the incident. And it is not that he is out for the long distance record, either, but he early found that he could write each week better stories than he could buy once a month and so, instead of wading through a mass of stories, he advertises that he is not reading outside contributions and devotes part of the time he saves to giving the directors just what they want. Like most prolific writers, he is an old time newspaper man, and for fifteen years he was a Hearst editor, which means a lot to those familiar with the erratic editorial policy of those papers. His faculty of seeing back of the little things was developed on the editorial desk, for the editor must be able to see beyond the copy turned in by the reporter and dig the real story out. Now he is doing the same thing, but he is turning his stories into pictures instead of headlines and body type. Incidentally he comes of a family of writers.

Lloyd Lonergan.

Close-Ups.

There seems to be a growing tendency to increase the use of close-up pictures. Lately we saw a subject in which a sitting room was used. At various times three portions of this room were used for close-up pictures, instead of always using the full set. The idea was that it was better to follow the players with the camera than to bring them down to the front line and play all the action in one square yard of stage. If Mary had to write a letter, instead of getting paper and pen at the desk and bringing it down to the camera, the latter was moved over to get a close-up of the desk. This was vastly better, though it should be used sparingly where the close-up is but a part of a scene, the opening and closing of which uses the full stage. Instead show the full stage scene, cut back to something else and come to a close-up of the part of the scene you want. The temptation to overwork a novelty is strong and should be guarded against, but where it can be done without confusing the action, it is well to use the effect at times.

In writing these close-ups, do not count them as sets. If you have six full scenes and three different close-ups in a library, it is all one set and not four sets, and enter it as one set in your scene plot. Mark the scenes in this fashion:

1.—Library—and give the action.

7.—Library as in No. 1—Close-up of Mary at desk, etc.

11.—Library as in No. 1—Close-up of John and Mary in arm chair by fire.

This will indicate clearly just what you want shown and still not confuse with a seeming multiplicity of sets.

Plenty.

The other day a man told us that he had the names of thirteen hundred writers of photoplays for circular use, and it would seem that some of the schools double up on the pupil by selling his name to other companies. We have never been able to find that any company of the three big sections permit this, but it is remarkable how these addresses get about.

And mind you, thirteen hundred is an absurdly small proportion of the whole number. There are more likely thirteen thousand persons in the United States trying to write plays—and fewer than five thousand plays being bought each year.

Find Out.

Before you take the course of the photoplay school in Washington, that guarantees that you will sell one play, find out just what they guarantee. There seems to be no time limit, and some of the writers who have demanded the return of their money have been quieted by the offer of the company to take one of their plays for five dollars. As the company has not even a camera it is difficult to determine where they will make production, but the proposition seems to be within the postal regulations and the unfortunate pupil is left without redress. This is the same company that offers to enter you as a qualified author for a fee of one dollar. As a side line they sell the addresses they obtain to other schools. Before you invest in the course find out what the guarantee means. It is worth a couple of dollars in a legal fee to save more than that.

Floaters.

Don't be a floater. Don't stop around and take half a dozen courses because the first one did not help you much. We have been interested in a writer who seems to want to get ahead and who gives considerable promise, and we have just learned that she has enrolled in the sixth course that she has taken since she started in. She wants to get ahead and buy her knowledge ready-learned, and when she finds that one teacher cannot give her immediate success she passes on to the next and the next, never learning, but, always being disorganized because no two teachers use the same method. The only way to learn is to procure competent instruction and then study hard and work faithfully. You cannot buy your thinking ready done. Don't expect to.

Cut-in Leaders.

Do not cut in a leader immediately after the scene opens. Give at least ten feet of essential action before the leader flashes and the result will look more like a play and less like a pictorial hash. And don't merely think you have ten feet of action. Write in full ten feet of action and you'll have it correct.

This is one of the little points on which even the practiced writer may go wrong; a nicety of direction that occurs only to the studio writer or one close to the camera.

Pull.

It is all very well to talk about pull, but the only lasting pull is good work. The other day a young man brought a story into a studio with a request for a personal reading, and the editor read it just to be able to give concrete illustrations to his explanation of just why the story was impossible, but the story showed merit and the young man, an orderly in a sanitarium, was placed on the acting role for a few weeks to gain camera experience, preparatory to being given reconstruction work. There is no such thing as pull. The seeming pull is nothing more than hard work. It may take you a little time to get found out, but three members of the Inquest Club, starting from the ground, are now in studio employ, and not one of them had the vestige of a pull other than a record of good stories a few months ago.

Getting Wise.

We have always contended that Marc Edmund Jones would get wisdom even though Marcedmunding is a synonym for visioning back. Never have we felt more certain that since he wrote:

> I am going for no speed records. After trying seven tworeelers in seven days, and finding that only two sold in their original form, I have had enough. As a matter of fact, I find that in order to keep up the quality of stuff that I have been turning out, even though I employ a stenographer, I average a little short of one story a week. If I did not sell every story I wrote and was not able to get high prices, I would soon go "busted." It is also essential that each and every release be successful, and occasionally, unusually so.

But then he adds:

> In this, I have been fortunate, considering that every story I turn out incorporates some new effect, and is an experiment of some sort.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

C. D. M.—It is not necessary to fasten your script with a paper clip, but it holds the sheets together and prevents accident. Use a hot iron and a piece of paper over the crease marks and you can iron them out if they are not too bad. Where a character passes from one scene to the next, he should wear the same clothes. If he comes from the street to a parlor, write in some short flash to give a lapse of time in which, presumably, this change is made. We have no line on the magazine you mention. Never did do business with that class of publication. The play scripts are probably being held for consideration. Give them time. Your faculty for picking up general information will be invaluable to you in the long run.

M. E. S.—Not much demand for "snow stuff." Try Miss Gauntier, in care of Warner's Features, or one of the Los Angeles companies. No company would be likely to purchase a biblical script. They have bibles and script writers of their own. The Ed-Au requires the authorship of ten scripts. Send a stamped and self addressed envelope for the address of the local inquest circle. You must have had one script produced.

N. C.—If the scene does not require too distinctively local color, it could be made in this country. You could not produce on the Harlem river a Cambridge-Oxford boat race, but you could show a field of corn. Corn fields are pretty much alike, but there is a difference in the environment of boat races.

J. W.—If you get more for a full script than a synopsis, try and sell the full script first. If you fail, then offer the synopsis to one of the companies buying synopses only. That's simple arithmetic, isn't it? No firm gives much consideration to the palpably amateur script, but any company will consider the work of an unknown writer if it is in proper form and they are in the market.

V. C. H.—We have not that Pathe cast. A release slip is a form supplied by a company which wishes to purchase your script. It is a legal release of all your rights to the purchasing company. You may either mark your script "At usual rates" and take what is offered, or name your price. The latter is not the usual practice and hurts your chance of a sale. But don't try to tell until you know more about the business than is shown in your form of inquiry.

LOIS—The increasingly slothful Biograph Identifier says the girl in "A Bunch of Flowers" is Violet Reid. She was formerly with Majestic and Thanhouser. The other answer later.

M. B. R. M.—A synopsis is a synopsis and not something else. A synopsis is a short story of your plot, your plot in condensed form. Do not write it in scenes, but as a running story. When submitted alone you can exceed the 250 word limit if you have to. The brokerage firm you mention is evidently not reliable. Apply to your postmaster and he will get an inspector on the job, or go right down to the Department since you are there.

B. R. R.—Miss Mary E. Ryan was Rose in "A Man From The West" and Edgar Jones was William Dow in "Treasures on Earth."

L. J. R.—Photoplays are issued on certain days. A cold copy is one not sold at that time but several months later. Generally they are cheaper than a new run. There were no release dates in those days. We are inclined to think it was an old George Melies (not the present Melies), but we do not believe you could locate a copy now. Business reasons for the omission of those stories, but not being our secret, we can't tell you why. The changes you speak of are provided for and are merely a part of a gradual change that seems to be inevitable. "From the Manger to the Cross" was released by Kalem the original makers, after the year the General Film is supposed to handle these specials. We think you have Mr. Thanhouser correctly placed. He is a former theatrical manager. Eclipse has no other release name.

W. B. S.—You are wrong. You are not writing on script paper. This is too long. No set rule can be laid down, but generally it is best to establish the identity of your characters in action so far as possible and to use leader sparingly, certain companies to the contrary. The example you give can be done with one leader and three scenes. It's easy. Try it, send it in with a return envelope and we'll tell you how close you come and collect that release slip.

A. F. S.—The matter of address did not enter into the problem you mention. Probably they had changed editors in the interval and the other man did not like it. It is proper to say "they exit." It is not amateurish but just plain foolish to send in a synopsis and offer to send the rest if that is liked. Don't send letters. The script will speak for itself.

R. T. B.—The reason looks like a polite let-down. Don't send it back, but try other companies.

R. H.—There is no difference between a "producer" and "director." There is no average number of scenes to any certain length. Write the company for the cast you want. We can't give the space.

W. K. J.—We do not indentify fall blonde beauties and anyhow they change so quickly at the Biograph now that the Indentifier is dizzy (and so are some of the players).

Comments on the Films

Licensed

GIPSY LOVE (Cines), March 17.—A two-part photoplay embracing in its plot a romantic love story of intensity, considerably after the usual style of stories heretofore filmed of the nomads. It will prove of interest to the romantically inclined. It is well made and the acting is all that can be desired. There is not much that can be said of the theme, and the foolish lover of the gypsy girl carries no sympathy; rather pity for his shallowness. It is not a film version of the opera of the same caption.

A REAL HELPMATE (Edison), March 17.—This offering is an interesting story, written by Frank Hart and produced by Preston Kendall. The plot illustrates that the faithful services of a talented employee are not always appreciated, even when, at the risk of life and limb, he attempts to do his duty. The faith and devotion of a wife is shown, elucidating how the encouraging helpmate can assist in the winning. Barry O'Moore, Gertrude McCoy, little Anna Clifford and Charles Sutton ably portray the principal parts. This is a good number.

WHIFFLES AND THE DIAMOND PIN (Pathe), March 17.—This is a somewhat amusing photoplay, but not extravagantly so. Whiffles gets into a mess of trouble as usual, but wins out in the end, also as usual. He gets out of the clutches of a loan shark in a surprising and accidental manner that surprises even himself. It is well-done and will please.

THE LAZIEST MAN (Lubin), March 17.—The only thing that can be said about this picture is that nothing like it was ever made before, at least let us hope not. The foundation is a tale as old as the famous gentleman, Methuselah. It is heralded as a comedy—but it is far from it. It is idiotic and nauseating. This offering has no place among the usual acceptable and enjoyable subjects released under the Lubin brand.

THE STORY OF VENUS (Selig), March 17.—This picture play is a pretentious and spectacular production. The author is Gilson Willets and N. McGregor the director. Adelia Lane is a regular Venus and Frank Newburg a fine Adonis until he is killed. The inevitable old apple of discord causes all the trouble until it is eaten by Circe's pet pig; then all ends happily. This picture is splendidly costumed and photographed.

OH, DOCTOR! (Essanay), March 17.—This photoplay illustrates to what extremes scenario writers will go to obtain an "idea." This one is founded on a hackneyed story so old that it is new. However, it is well put over, but will be recognized by all old timers. Billy Mason as a piano-tuner did good work; if he was taken for a doctor. Several pretty girls help along. The photography is good. It will please.

A WINTER HOLIDAY IN BERNES, SWITZERLAND (Edison), March 18.—Some tremendous pictures of Alpine scenery under snow with clouds sweeping by. It is above the ordinary offering.

A BOARDING HOUSE ROMANCE (Edison), March 18.—A farce of rather ordinary plot and general trend; it made a little laughter. There are one or two fine scenes, especially so is that of the youth out on the fire escape in the pouring rain. Bliss Milford is the author and the producer is Charles France.

COL. HEEZA LIAR SHIPWRECKED (Pathe), March 18.—Another of J. R. Bray's laugh making cartoon series. A clever picture and a desirable offering.

VIEWS OF BUDA-PESTH (Pathe), March 18.—On the same reel with the Heeza Liar skit, it is most worthy and gives balance to the offering, heightening its value.

LUCK IN ODD NUMBERS (Essanay), March 18.—A farce with a slight but cleverly thought-up idea; it made reasonable laughter, is lively and though a bit rough in some places will probably be liked.

THE COP ON THE BEAT (Selig), March 18.—A love story with "the cop on the beat" as its hero and a girl, temporarily in poverty with her old mother and little brother, living nearby as heroine. It isn't pictured as in life; but is watched with interest to see what will happen. There is one scene which shows a burglar coming through a window and his head fills it, though when seen from outside the window is of normal size.

THE GHOST (Vitagraph), March 18.—A farce with too little fun for a whole reel of film; yet it made some laughter. The players should have been much younger. Mary H. O'Connor is the author and it was produced by W. J. Bauman. A fair commercial offering.

SINGLE HANDED (Essanay), March 19.—A Western story of about ordinary merit, enacted by a pleasing cast which includes Reina Valdez, True Boardman and Carl Stockdale. The newly elected sheriff recaptures the prisoners released by his unsuccessful rival. The scenes are picturesque and well photographed.

THE IDLER (Vitagraph), March 19.—This is a well rounded story which drives home a moral. The young idler is glad to return to his job after his experiences as a hobo. S. Rankin Drew, Rose Tapley, Darwin Karr and others appear in this strongly handled production. The photography is clear and pleasing.

WINKY WILLY'S PRIVATE SHOW (Melies), March 19.—The little boy calls on an injured girl and dances for her because she cannot see him in moving pictures. Slight but pleasing.

CUPID'S WINDOW (Melies), March 19. This, on same reel with above, tells a clever story of how a young man was induced to fall in love with exactly the girl his parents wanted him to marry. Good comedy, very prettily staged.

THE GOLDEN PATCH (Selig), March 19.—This is a comedy number, written by Roy L. McCardell. There are some rarely good characters in this, particularly the miser, Grubbins. The plot itself is rather too thin to get up the laughter it should have had. A little more action with the commendable effort for good characterizations would have made this a strong comedy. The scenes are well photographed.

THE RESTLESS WOMAN (Biograph), March 19.—The plot material in this picture, which shows how an actress marries a country man and later returns to her art, is very familiar. The production is so well handled and nicely photographed that it seems fresh and interesting. It gives the unromantic side of the life of an actress and the closing scenes, where she returns to find her former husband married to another, are quite pathetic.

TWO LITTLE VAGABONDS (Selig), March 20. -This comedy number follows the fortunes of two runaway boys, who are first seen in a box car. They have numerous rough experiences and finally sell newspapers and black shoes for a living. They become rivals over a girl, but another wins her. This is well pictured. The plot is very slight, but some of the scenes are quite amusing.

THE PRICE (Lubin), March 20.—Edward J. Peil and Ormi Hawley appear in this number as a young married couple. The wife's extravagances lead her husband to become a Raffles. This is well pictured and convincingly handled. The close is tragic and dramatic in its intensity, the husband being shot as he attempts to rob his own wife in a strange hotel. A strong production.

A MODEL YOUNG MAN (Vitagraph), March 20.—Sidney Drew gets hold of the observer's funny bone in this offering, taken from a story by Jacques Futrelle. He plays the part of a sporty young man who goes broke and receives a morning call from his sweetheart and her aunt. He has been out the night before and the comedy work is quite laughable. The photos are clear and the production pleasing.

THE FAMILY SKELETON (Kalem), March 20.—An amusing half reel with most of the scenes taken in a side show. The opening introduction of the various freaks was pleasing. John's wife is amazed when she discovers him posing as the fat lady. This is well pictured and enjoyable.

CYPRESS LOGGING in FLORIDA (Kalem), March 20.—This, on same reel with above, gives a very instructive series of pictures on marketing the "wood eternal" from the time the trees are cut till the lumber is ready for sale. A fine industrial offering.

A TRIP TO THE MOON (Lubin), March 21. On the same reel as "So Long Count." As the title suggests, this is a clever trick picture. It pleases, and one wonders at the methods adopted by the director and cameraman to get the natural looking effects. It pleases children and is full of comedy.

SO LONG COUNT (Lubin), March 21.—A somewhat boisterous farcical camedy that is made up of amusing and complicated situations that cause considerable laughter. After all the trouble caused by "Pa" for others he manufactures some for himself, but gets out of all, or perhaps into it deeper by marrying. On the same reel with "A Trip to the Moon."

HIS INDIAN NEMESIS (Kalem), March 21.—The story of the life of a friendly Indian is embraced in this plot, and for an Indian story it is very "gripping." The scenes are beautifully portrayed and the acting, costuming and make-up of the characters deserve the highest encomium. The actor that portrayed Gray Hawk, the leading character, is very artistic.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL (Selig), March 21.—Many interesting events were shown from various parts of the world, among which were Page's speech regarding the Panama Canal question; the laying of a keel-plate of a man of war with a horse shoe impressed upon it for "Luck"; Lieut. Hitchcock walking on water—his own invention, etc.

THE MESSAGE IN THE ROSE (Edison), March 21.—This photoplay starts out very prettily, but there seems to be a mistiness about it that must be analyzed after you have seen it. The dream of the old Italian woman has nothing in common to do with Mary and Joe. The rose went through enough vicissitudes to have withered a dozen times. The property man must have taken good care of it. However, it finally delivered its message. It is interesting if vague, also has some exciting scenes.

A HOT TIME IN SNAKEVILLE (Essanay), March 21.—Now, if you care to laugh, good and hearty, here is a funny one put over to a finish. The idea is good, the direction better and the acting best. Mustang Pete puts one over on himself and helps Slippery Slim, unintentionally, in his marital endeavors. The last seen of Pete he is running a race with himself toward tall timber. This will make an exhibitor that is losing money laugh.

A FRIEND OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY (Biograph), March 21.—This photoplay, as far as photography is concerned, has no fault, and the direction and mounting are adequate, but the outrageous selfism exhibited by the leading participants, especially on the part of the woman, is detrimental to the making or popular offerings. The world is full of such selfish creatures, but why foist them on the public in photoplays.

DINKELSPIEL'S BABY (Edison), March 23.—One of Dan Mason's picture comedies of which he is himself the life. It was plain that the audience counted it a good offering of entertainment. There is brightness and cleverness in it; but it makes an awkwardly improbable situation develop into a human and very laughable one, but the latter is so enjoyable that the former is lost sight of and the whole passes as fresh comedy. The truth is that nearly all the fun is in Dan Mason's acting. He, himself, wrote the script, which Charles M. Seay produced. The photography is clear.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 24 (March 23).—A parade of Huerta's army in Mexico City supposed to be 20,000 strong is given, is pictured and some other items.

THE WOMAN IN BLACK (Vitagraph), March 23.—Young club man arrests a nifty pair of crooks, one of whom is the "woman in black." There is nothing trite about the picture, though the same situation has been handled before, and it furnishes good amusement. The acting, while not especially noteworthy, is lively and keeps the action bright. A very fair offering. Frank Condon is the author and Maurice Costello, with Robert Gaillord, produced it. It is clearly photographed.

AN HOUR OF TERROR (Biograph), March 23.—Pretty heroine is carelessly locked in a big safe by her drunken father, but is rescued by the aid of her lover. Perhaps a burglar would have freed her, if he had been left alone; but why he was there at all at such an early hour is strange. The story is not reasonable and made laughter at the wrong times. It is not without camera consciousness and is poorly acted in places. Not a strong offering.

Licensed Special

THE PRICE OF VANITY (Vitagraph), March 17.—F. Marion Brandon wrote this two-part offering and Harry Lambert directed it. The theme of the plot illustrates the folly of a vain wife, who in her extravagances involves her husband in financial difficulties. She pays dearly for it in the finale. Naomi Childers as the wife does fine work. A good picture. Well acted and mounted in every way. The lighting of the scenes could be better.

THE WEAKER BROTHER (Lubin), March 18.—Poor offering, giving a war-time melodrama that made jeering laughter. It is in two reels and doesn't do credit to any one concerned. George Terwilliger wrote the script and Edgar Jones produced it.

THE AWARD OF JUSTICE (Kalem), March 18.—A two-part offering pretty well produced and with some excellent acting. The atmosphere, backgrounds and general handling of the action are good; but the story is weak and far from convincing. A minister, by his charitable ministrations, has converted a gangster, thereby winning the hatred of the gang. Two of the toughs waylay him, and while he grapples with one the other goes for the police. The gangster is killed with his own knife by the minister, and on the testimony of the "Rat" the latter is sent up for twenty years; he saws his way out of prison and makes for the hills, where he lives with a moonshiner whom he has converted. The "Rat," now prosperous, comes to the hills shooting, recognizes the minister and has the local justice—the minister's brother who has gone there saddened by the loss of his first case, his brother's—come to the cabin. The justice avers that he has never seen the minister and that he is not the man he defended. The "Rat" is a fine character sketch and the moonshiner also is human and real. These two are the strongest roles in the offering.

THE WASTED YEARS (Pathe), March 19.—This two-reel number is well constructed and nicely photographed throughout. The accidental shooting of the elder Marshall was well handled and numerous other scenes are pleasing. The plot itself has no very inspiring motive behind it as it might have had if Jack had seen the error of his ways and reformed. As the story stands it is a simple case of "the wages of sin is death." Francis Carlyle, Jack Standing and Pearl Sindelar are in the cast. A good production of an ordinary plot.

THE SECRET MARRIAGE (Lubin), March 19.—This two-reel number tells the story of a secret wedding between a city youth and a country girl. They become separated and are not reunited for several years. Both endure hard experiences from their foolish step. The story is not overdrawn and is enough like real life to be a strong argument against suppressed weddings. Webster Campbell, Dolly Larkin and Velma Whitman are in the cast.

SHADOWS (Essanay), March 20.—A two-reel offering, featuring Francis X. Bushman as a secret service man engaged in rounding up a gang of counterfeiters. Fanny, the girl reporter, also works on the case. The plot holds the attention. It is absurd in places, but there is novelty in the settings and much attention is given to small details. The atmosphere of mystery is also well in evidence. The love interest appears when the detective meets the girl reporter. This is entertaining, though it lacks intensity of interest.

THE DOUBLE SHADOW (Edison), March 20.—A first rate story of a business partnership in which one man plays the scoundrel. There are no particular surprises in plot development, but the story moves along consistently and holds the interest all through. Augustus Phillips, Wm. Bechtel, Robert Brower, Gladys Hulette and others appear in the well balanced cast. The story might have had a little more action in places, but works up very well to a pleasing climax.

OLD RELIABLE (Vitagraph), March 21.—This two-part subject introduces a beautiful character, "Old Reliable," portrayed by Van Dyke Brooke, who made of it such a lovable old fellow, in his tribulations, that one almost forgot it was a picture. There was some frivolousness in some of the acting that marred one or two scenes and the continuity of the story seemed broken in the second reel. However, it is enjoyable and the finale bears with it a lesson and a moral that is wholesome.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN (Selig), March 23.—The same quality found in others of this series will make this as popular as they have been. It is even better than most of the former pictures in the series. The action is carried on with speed and maintains a feeling of suspense. The letting loose of the leopard's in the palace of Allaha is not without a thrill if the consequent happenings are a bit unconvincing.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S DUTY (Kalem), March 23.—A two-part offering rather commercial in plot, but has the advantage of being effectively put together. Having the district attorney in love with the daughter of the gambler whom it is his duty to prosecute, is a bit trite; but the fact that it develops just this one situation and tires for no sensational thrills is in its favor. The acting is fair as are the staging and photography.

LOST IN MID OCEAN (Vitagraph), March 23.—A three-reel offering with a ship wreck very much, so far as distant views of the disaster go, like the tragic end of the "Titanic." If a finely suggestive series of views of such a catastrophe make a three-reel picture, then this is big offering surely; for the striking of the steamer on the berg and its sinking are astonishingly real. The wreck views are not the whole of the picture's good things; for the story is clear, if convincing. It has a pretty heroine, although there is no strong acting in it from first to last and there is plenty of front and center to the camera playing. Camera work is very good, for the most part. It is not quite up to the Vitagraph high standard, if considered as a whole; but makes a fair offering.

Independent

DAD'S TERRIBLE MATCH (Apollo), March 15. When you know it is one put over by Fred Mace you can gamble that it is almost funny, especially when Bud Duncan and Miss Loverage assist him. Well, this is no exception to the rule. It is well done in every respect.

THE WOMAN WITHOUT A SOUL (Majestic), March 17.—What there is about this feature to afford it any prominence above the ordinary productions is hard to discover. Its plot is rather singular and the theme is neither very good nor is it really bad—not convincing might apply aptly. The plot is dense and disconnected. However, with all its shortcomings it was taken very goodnaturedly.

THE GIRL WHO DARED (Beauty), March 17.—Wholly artificial and arbitrary in its story, this picture takes a path that will touch cords of momentary sympathy. It is for the uncritical; others may think it pretty poor. The acting and photography are acceptable.

THE COMING OF THE PADRES (American), March 18.—This is a beautiful offering, historical in nature. The bi-cennial of the birth of Father Serra who celebrated his first mass at Santa Barbara Mission, when California was a Spanish colony. It is impressive. The religious rites introduced are incidental to the dramatic story. The picture was made on the grounds and the interior views of the "Hermita" the mission church, are shown. The photography is beautifully done and the acting dignified. This is a splendid picture.

THE GRAND PASSION (Thanhouser), March 20.—In the early part of this offering there is a picture of a supersensitive lover that gets over strongly and is humanly convincing; but there is so much downright foolishness in the story's development that, as an offering, we are afraid to commend it. We feel sure that it will fail of popularity.

MESSENGER 845 (Reliance), March 20.—Story is commercial in that it offers nothing fresh and presents a new arrangement of old stuff without true authorship. Messenger 845 is a girl dressed in her brother's district telegraph clothes. She has an adventure with two toughs who rob her and lock her in an old room from which she escapes and brings the police. There is entertainment in it, for the players are acceptable; but the story fails to get over.

CARLOTTA, THE BEAD STRINGER (Rex), March 22.—A one-reel offering by Lou Chaney, who plays the villain's part. Pauline Bush and Murdock McQuarrie are in the cast. The Italian characterizations are good and the settings in keeping. The story itself concerns the effort of the villain to sell the girl into White Slavery and is of a common type. The photography is fair.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, No. 10 (Reliance), March 23.—Norma Phillips has a lesson how to dance the Maxixe; members of the audience can profit also, if so inclined. Besides this she meets baseball stars. The offering is of about the same quality as its predecessors.

THEY WHO DIG PITS (Majestic), March 24.—Weak story; in fact, it is the old moonshiner story with most of the truly dramatic quality taken out. It seems as though an attempt to make the old situation fresh had served to make it unconvincing. It is well acted and has a good mountain atmosphere. The photography is good.

AFTER HER DOUGH (Komic), March 25.—This is a melodramatic burlesque that contains enough real comedy ideas to make a four-reel picture. It is of the "ginger" class and every move is a (part of the) picture. The mix-up of the "yeggs," the police, the anarchists, bomb throwers and rubes keep the audience howling. How little Miss Fay Tichner, "The Heiress," survived it all is a miracle. This is a real burlesque melodrama.

CRUEL, CRUEL LOVE (Keystone), March 26.—Slight in texture; but it makes a pleasing, laughable picture. It is one of the kind of which we have no doubts at all that it will go well and be liked.

BARNYARD FLIRTATIONS (Keystone), March 28.—Of all the rough and tumble burlesque comedies ever made this one swipes the palm. The entire cast of principals as well as their support must be made up of acrobats, even the young lady who plays the farmer's daughter. She certainly earns her salary. This picture was rewarded with the heartiest laughter from the reviewers, and it was spontaneous. Mack Sennett can certainly dig up funny ones and put them over. Exhibitors, you can book this "for fun."

THE SURGEON'S EXPERIMENT (Majestic), March 29.—A prominent surgeon demonstrates his theory to his senator friend, on a wager, that he can permanently convert a notorious criminal into a dependable, trustworthy man through surgery. By subterfuge the doctor obtains his subject and wins the wager, proving that his theory is correct. This two-reel picture is of scientific interest and educational value. It will hold the attention of the intelligent spectator. A current of melodrama ripples through the plot that adds interest. Paul Scardon as the crook, and after the operation as the trusted employee is natural and artistic. Some small details in the working out of the plot are somewhat abrupt.

FORGETTING (Imp), March 30.—Ethel Grandin, Hobart Henley and Edmund Mortimer appear in this successful offering. The photography is excellent and Miss Grandin develops unsuspected powers as an emotional actress. The story is one in which the neglected wife falls in love with another and more worthy man than her husband and at the close of the story finds happiness with him. This is well above the average picture in point of good acting.

A BAD EGG (Powers), March 30.—An entertaining little comedy number, in which Queenie puts her name and address on an egg. Warren writes her a love letter, signing Kenneth's name, which of course creates trouble with the latter's wife. The restaurant scenes were funny, but overdone, so far as the woman's intoxication was concerned. The photography was not quite up to standard.

WHY UNIVERSAL IKE LEFT HOME (Universal Ike), March 31.—This offering, featuring Augustus Carney in his cowboy character, has the usual ranch setting. Most of the amusement comes toward the close, when a female dummy is placed in his bed, but it is not of a very compelling sort.

GOING SOME (Crystal), March 31.—Pearl and Chester appear in this offering. The chief situation is an elopement, but the plot was not very strong.

ONE HAPPY TRAMP (Crystal), March 31. On same reel with above. Quite a pleasing idea in this. The novelist and the tramp change places for a day and the resulting scenes are interesting. A good half reel.

CUPID INCOGNITO (Nestor), April 1.—This is a pleasing comedy offering, with Edna Maison, Dorothy Davenport and Wallace Reid in the leading roles. The action concerns a Western girl who is left a fortune by her father. Jim's appearance toward the last of the picture was nicely staged and humorous in effect. Good comedy of its type.

THE LUCK OF HOG WALLOW GULCH (Joker), April 1. A story of crooked mining manipulations, with a number of laughable scenes in the fore part. The fun is of a rough and tumble sort. The wallowing in the mud at the last makes a bad feature and one that some exhibitors will prefer to cut out.

THE CERTAINTY OF MAN (American), April 1.—Spectators will hardly take this deeply melodramatic picture seriously; they will be wondering whether it is a burlesque or not. It uses a handful of the old, old melodrama stuff and yet it hardly reaches comedy. We, ourselves, are not sure whether or not it intended to make laughter.

WHY KENTUCKY WENT DRY (Frontier), April 2. A mountain story with a burlesque turn, picturing a love affair and a feud. The scenes are rather choppy and too disconnected to get up much amusement. The photography is pleasing.

IN THE EYE OF THE LAW (Rex), April 2.—The main idea in this is novel enough for a two-reel production, but even in this single reel it is not made the most of. There is considerable originality, if not plausibility, in the photograph of the murderer being taken from the eye of the dead man. Robert Leonard and Hazel Buckham appear in this. The story is not uninteresting as it stands, but is loosely handled.

SUCH A VILLAIN (Nestor), April 3.—A one-reel burlesque, produced by Al E. Christie, with Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde and Lee Moran in the cast. This is based on the familiar subject of the villain hypnotist, from whom the hero saves the girl after many adventures. Not particularly new in subject matter, but contains amusing moments.

STRANGE EVIDENCE (Frontier), April 4.—A Western release which grows quite interesting toward the close. Bessie Burbridge, as the girl heroine, does quite an ingenious piece of detective work. There is not much feeling in this story, but it is rather pleasing.

Independent Specials

THE TWINS' DOUBLE (Gold Seal), March 10.—Francis Ford directs this three-reel picture, supported by Grace Cunard. There is in it much double and triple exposure, and it must be said that the camera work is excellent. One of the features of the story is a railroad wreck, in miniature, as seen from the window of a switchman's tower. The scene of the prisoner being subjected to the third degree will thrill—it is unusually well done. The picture holds.

THE COMING OF THE REAL PRINCE (Reliance), March 21.—A modern fairy tale that concerns a girl given to imagining that there are in existence fairies, gnomes, etc., but hidden from mortal sight, only when they choose to make themselves visible. She conjures up a prince and two loom up. The development of the plot proves to her which is the worthy one. It is all very interesting. Olga Treskoff, Thomas R. Miles, Harry Spingler and Sue Balfour are the principals and play the roles finely.

THE ATONEMENT (Majestic), March 22. A clearly suggested slip in morals on the part of a mountain girl with a city man is the cause of a series of tragic episodes leading to the death of the male offender years later. The woman's mountain lover had married her notwithstanding; but she had died in child birth. The story without being deeply offensive is not of the most healthy quality, because it isn't truthful. There is action all through it; but it is not dramatic in any real sense of the term. The acting of the leading woman in the first episode is the strongest thing in the offering. The backgrounds are well chosen and the camera work is praiseworthy.

THE MISER'S REVERSION (Thanhouser), March 24.—This idea used in this three-part offering which pictures an old man as changing, under the influence of the elixir of youth, from infirm age to youth and so down through babyhood to prehistoric man and to an ape, was the main interest of a recent Edison farce. Yet here Sidney Bracy, who takes the role of the miser, has been able to put something of horror and terror into the changing back which is fresh, very well done and effective. It would have been a startling picture in one reel. Here it drags a bit; yet will capture attention none the less. The camera work is skillful and makes the transitions seem wonderfully convincing.

THE GRINGO (Kay-Bee), March 27. A two-reel picture drama with the plot located in the Southern California mining country; Tom H. Ince and Richard V. Spencer are the authors and producers. This is rather sensational in tone. Through treachery an aged monk is made to suffer; all for the greed of gold. Tom Simpson, "The Gringo," is well done by Harry Keenan and the others in the cast ably assisted in making this a very interesting picture.

TWO LITTLE WAIFS (Bison), March 28. This two-reel offering was written by Lincoln J. Carter. It is well photographed and abounds in action. In fact, the chief fault of the production is that it covers numerous lapses of years in quick, lightning like scenes which give little time for the situations to get hold of the observer. The story is very generous in plot, but becomes somewhat involved. The snow storm scenes toward the close were well pictured. This is only a fair success.

THE TOWN OF NAZARETH (American), March 30. A two part offering that would have been better in one reel. The theme is a double love story, of a poet who lost in love, and of the son of the girl he loved who, refusing the poet, married a dyer of the Vermont village, Nazareth. The poet becomes famous; the dyer, without good reason, accounts himself a failure and runs away and dies. How the son is sent to Harvard and after attempting to make good in the city comes home and makes business come to him is the chief interest in the second reel. There are crude things in it a-plenty and good things, too. The atmosphere of the country town makes the story interesting. The acting is fair and the photography acceptable. A fair offering; a bit above the commercial plane.

THE EMBEZZLER (Gold Seal), March 31.—A two-reel offering, written and produced by Allan Dwan, with Murdock MacQuarrie and Pauline Bush in the leading roles. The plot is familiar in most of its details. The girl's father is in the power of the villain, played by Lon Chaney, who blackmails him at will. The girl does some amateur detective work, and later in the story one of the gang shoots the villain. The story is well constructed, but not very fresh in subject matter.

ALONE WITH THE DEVIL (Great Northern Specials).—A four-part offering rather artistically produced and humanly acted, so that there are many fine scenes and pleasing pictures. The story, with much that is far-fetched in it, is not without dignity, inasmuch as it gives a good portrayal of friendship which is at once both convincing and worthy. But it has a gruesome background in the work of the hypnotist devil and his influence on the wife. The effect, as a whole, is not quite pleasant enough to be truly entertaining. The "devil" is the business rival of the hero and has the latter's wife under hypnotic control, forcing her to reveal her husband's business secrets. The husband has a friend, a lawyer, who acts as guardian angel to him.

THE MYSTERY OF 15 HILL STREET (Film Releases of America).—A three-part picture dealing with a foiled attempt to rob a bank of a large sum which is being sent to another bank. The last third of it is a not convincing nor novel chase in which a gypsy girl on horseback overtakes a high powered automobile, is captured and hidden in a room at No. 15 Hill Street. She cuts a hole in the floor, sees where the money is secreted and, when the police come, reveals its place to them, freeing her lover, who is under suspicion. The backgrounds are freshly interesting and the whole has enough action so that we can count it a fair offering. The staging and photography are acceptable.

COUNT ZARKA (Great Northern Specials).—The villain of this story acts so foolishly that he loses the respect of the spectator, a fatal defect in a character on whose power for ill the whole interest of the tale depends. The picture makes a rather dry three reels and is surely far below the standard set by the Great Northern studio. The story deals with a court intrigue and is furnished with a few stately scenes, some fine uniforms, a pretty heroine, interesting backgrounds for many of its scenes and the trite machinery of hidden doors, unsuspected holes in the floor and other fittings of the kind so often seen of late in the castles of rich villains.

SHADOWS OF YESTERDAY (Ammex).—A three-reel picture of Mexico. It has good atmosphere; but follows a well-worn path where many like it in situation and, for the most part, in development have passed before. It is not without freshness of background and even of incident and so will hold strongly enough to be termed a fair release. It is well staged, clearly photographed and humanly acted.

SAMSON (Universal).—This is a big six-reel production; but we can not say that it adequately fulfills its mission as such when compared with others in the same class with which it must compete. It is not without graces. It would be hard to find a finer Samson than is Warren Kerrigan, who is more than the average in size, is perfect physically and is youthful and graceful. It is plain that the picture's producer has studied Doré, the great French artist, famous for his Biblical engravings, and has profited much by it. There are excellent artistic scenes all through the offering, such as the invasion of Judea by the Philistines, the temple of Dagon, and many of mob scenes. But the action lacks dramatic quality and interest, for the scenario is spineless. Spectators who are not readers of the Bible will hardly be able to comprehend the full significance of the picture. There was some discussion behind this reviewer as to the meaning of those words on the sub-titles—"Judges 14:12."

One of the things that is very pleasing in the picture is the lavish display of men with spears and armor, and of women dressed in silk robes of gracefold folds. The interior scenes and backgrounds are for the most part commendable. Manoah's house is spacious and full of the Orient, while the temple scenes, including the idol of the god, are delightfully like the Doré picture temples. One wishes that with all these good qualities the scenario could have provided real life to the story, the more because it is one of the most dramatic that we have.

FRECKLES (Domino), April 2.—A two-part drama that partakes of the inevitable gangster type of theme and plot. It opens among the class that labor physically, and Freckles is one of them. He is discharged for fighting, and out of work he is almost persuaded to join a tough gang. The action is very melodramatic and swift. The parts are well played, especially the "gang"; the make-up being very artistic. Freckles is well played and perfect in type. This is a pretentious and deserving production.

THE LAMB, THE WOMAN AND THE WOLF (Bison), April 4.—A three-reel production, written and produced by Allan Dwan, with Pauline Bush and Murdock MacQuarrie in the leads. The subtitles indicated more pathos in the beginning than the situations warranted. Mr. MacQuarrie was much more interesting after he had abandoned his meek attitude and began defending himself. The situations in the second reel are quite stirring and the interest is maintained from this point. In the latter part of the story the wife shoots her husband, the Wolf, by mistake. The production as a whole is one of about average merit.

Question No. 26.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used.

Suppose you have the following: Two projectors, each using 40 amperes; one spot, using 12 amperes, and a dissolver, using a total of 30 amperes; current, 110 volt d. c. You are using resistance, and your employer inquires as to the advisability of installing a d.c. to d.c. economizer to replace the resistance (rheostats). What advice would you give him? Current, 9 cents per k. w. Suppose he proposed installing an engine and dynamo, total current consumption, including incandescents, being 85 amperes, with momentary excess when two projection arcs are burning at once, what, in detail, would your advice be?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 20.

The Roll of Honor on question No. 20 consists of W. S. James, Camden, N. J.; Harry Dobson, Toronto, Canada; Denver, Colo.; L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y.; Seattle, Wash.; Minneapolis, Minn., and also a late, but very excellent reply comes from Lee Kelley, Fort Flagler, Wash.

The replies by James, Minges, Usher and Kelley were particularly good, and that of Usher was especially so. I wish room permitted of the publication of all of these replies. That of "Chicago" was selected, however, as best because it covered the most points with fewest errors. But, in addition to Chicago's reply, I want to mention some points in the replies of Usher, Minges and James.

Usher says:

> In machines of large capacity a long commutator must be used because the narrow commutor bars must be lengthened in accordance with the output; there must be a greater area of brush surface resting on the commutator in order to pick up the load without over-running the capacity of the brush, or the narrow commutator segment contact surface. If a short commutator and small brushes were used where the amperage is high, sparking would result. By using a long commutator a number of brushes can be used, set side by side, and a number of smaller brushes, comprising a set, works much better than a single brush of equal width would....A dirty ring on one part of the commutator can usually be traced to one of the brushes which may have a hard spot in it, causing sparking, dust collection, etc., because the hard spot will not wear away as fast as the rest of the brush. Carbon brushes are better on medium speed machines....On high speed and high tension machines wire brushes are preferred on account of their strength, long wearing qualities, and freedom from liability to chip.

Concerning the losing of the spring's temper, brother Usher says:

> The flexible copper wire attached to the brush from the brush holder may have become detached in some manner, so that the spring is carrying a good percentage of the load, and this spring being a poor conductor, naturally heats and loses its temper. In some cases, especially in small generators, there is no such connecting wire, and, through the interior of the brush holder becoming dirty, the spring is forced to carry considerable current. In this case install brushes with the connecting wire on them and save further trouble.

Friend Minges says:

> The capacity of carbon brushes is about 35 amperes per square inch....The brush of a generator or motor should have not over 1¼ pounds tension per square inch of contact.

Brother James' reply covered the whole question very well. His method of making temporary small motor brushes was somewhat elaborate, and he suggested boiling them in paraffin. In connection with this he gave the following which is quite worthy of remembering:

> The paraffin should be hot enough to boil all the dampness out of the carbon. After the carbon has ceased to bubble, take it out and lay it on a piece of blotting paper in order to absorb the surplus paraffin which will run out. Do not have the paraffin too cool or it will not run out of the brush when you lay it down to drain, and this would result in a gummy piece of carbon which would not work well. The following is the test which cable splicers use in heating paraffin. It won't look well in print, but it is nevertheless very effective. After the paraffin becomes heated the cable splicer expectorates in the pot—not much but just a little. If the paraffin snaps and cracks, and evaporates the saliva before it reaches the bottom of the pot, it is correctly heated. This, as I said, won't look well in print, but there is nothing really wrong with it, because the intense heat instantly evaporates the saliva and purifies the paraffin.

Reply to Question No. 20.

By "Chicago," Member of Local Union No. 2.

The question:

Why have some generators more than two brushes, or sets of brushes? Why have some generators very wide commutators and two or more brushes, placed side by side, in each holder? What amount of tension should a brush have? What troubles may be traced directly to the brushes? Giving remedy for each. Which are best—wire or carbon brushes, and why? Suppose your brush tension springs lose their temper, what would that indicate, and what would be the remedy? Suppose you had several small motor fans, using ⅜ or ¼ inch round carbon brushes, and you, through carelessness or otherwise, ran out of brushes right in the middle of hot weather; it would take days to get a supply. What would you do?

The answer:

The necessary number of brushes, or sets of brushes, is determined by the number of poles the generator has. A two-pole machine has two brushes or sets of brushes; a four-pole machine has four, and so on. The width of the commutator is not determined by one factor, nor are the number of brushes each holder contains determined by one factor. Low voltage machines which produce a high amperage, such as those used for nickel plating, have very wide commutators with several brushes in each holder. This is necessary, since the brushes must have commutator contact sufficient to handle the heavy amperage output of these machines without sparking or developing other troubles. On ordinary light and power generators there are several reasons for each holder containing more than one brush. First let us take a machine which operates continuously, perhaps for days, without shutting down. If the holder only contained one brush you would have to stop the machine in order to replace a worn out brush or make any repairs of any kind to one of the brushes, but if the holder contains two or more brushes, one can be removed for a short time, or raised from the commutator without doing anything more than temporarily overloading its mate or mates. Then by having a wide commutator and several brushes it is not necessary to carry such a heavy tension, since if the brush contact with the commutator be ample there is much less liability to spark, or, in other words, the load per square inch of contact is much less.

As regards the trouble which may be traced directly to brushes, they are as follows: (1) Grooved commutator. (2) Sparking. (3) Generator failing to pick up its load. (4) Commutator cut or scratched. The reasons and remedies for each are as follows: (1) Due to lack of "float" (end play) in the armature, which is sometimes assisted by setting the brushes in the various holders directly in line with each other so that each brush bears on the same portion of the commutator instead of having them staggered slightly with relation to each other. The remedy is: Give the armature from ⅛ to ¼ inch end motion, according to size of the machine, and set your brushes so that the entire surface of the commutator will be, as nearly as possible, equally worn. (2) Caused by insufficient tension, overload on the brushes, or dirty brushes, the latter usually being due to the lubricant (paraffin) working out of the end of the brush, and forming a semi-insulating coating on both the brush and the commutator, due to the fact that it gathers dust and carbon. Sparking may also be due to the brushes sticking in the holders by reason of improper fitting, or gum or dirt. The remedy for these various things is self-evident, and I think needs no explanation. (3) This may be due to the brushes making improper contact with the commutator by reason of loose tension, or by reason of the ends of the brushes being coated with dirt and paraffin. The remedy is, of course, to tighten the tension or clean the brushes, as the case may be. (4) This is probably due to hard spots or impurities in the carbon. The obvious remedy is to get a better grade of brush. As to the amount of tension the brush should have, why I think that has been dealt with already. However, it should be just sufficient to make good electrical contact with the commutator, and no more. Excessive tension wears both the commutator and brushes unduly, whereas slack tension causes sparking and possible failure to pick up the load.

As to wire and carbon brushes, the fact that the metallic brush has been almost wholly discarded is evidence that the carbon is the best. As a matter of fact, the carbon brush will stand greater variation of load without sparking than will those made of metal. The metallic brush does not wear down evenly and requires filing and dressing up, whereas the carbon brush maintains its shape until it is worn out. The point of the metal brush has tendency to fill up with dirt and "spread", also the wire brush is likely to wear in such way that it gradually creeps over and covers more commutator surface than it should. However, question 21 will cover this matter more fully. If the brush tension springs lose their temper (causing the operator to lose his also) it is evident that they are carrying too much current. The remedy is, put in a current carrying jumper to assist the springs.

As to the small motor brushes, why, I would just take some solid projection carbon stubs and file them down with a rasp or coarse file until they fit the holder. These would not be the best possible brushes, but they would answer temporarily very well. In fact I have already pulled off that stunt on several occasions. A year or so ago when I was running a motor-generator set on the South Side I broke a generator brush and found I had none on hand. It was my own fault, but it would take an hour or so to get a new supply. I took some projection carbons and bound them together firmly with fine copper wire, first flattening them slightly so they would just slip into the holder, trimmed down the points to fit the commutator and slipped them in the holder of the generator. It worked fine until the new brushes came.

Criticism on Answer to Question No. 12.

F. H. Geer, Uplands, California, writes:

Mr. James, in his reply to question 12, passes very lightly over roughening of the commutator due to high mica. But this trouble is becoming very common, particularly in high speed machines. The remedy is slotting, i. e., cutting the mica down about 1/32 of an inch below the surface of the segment, but this, however, is not a remedy for the operator to apply.

If this trouble is becoming very common, as brother Geer says, then we would like to know the reason for it, to the end that the matter be brought forcibly to the attention of the manufacturers. Is it by reason of the bars being made of soft copper, or of poor material, or what? Perhaps friend Geer can give us some further information along these lines.

By the way, it strikes me it would be a splendid scheme, and one which would be worth the extra expenditure involved, to buy a second or duplicate armature for both the motor and generator of motor generator outfits. Of course, I know this would involve a considerable extra outlay, but in the long run would it not be worth it? The extra armatures could be carefully stored, and then when anything went wrong with the one in the machine it would only be necessary to slip out the damaged one and slip in the new, and the damaged armature could then be sent to the factory for proper repairs.

As a matter of fact I do not know what an extra armature would cost. Perhaps it might be so expensive that the purchase of the second one would be practically prohibitive, but anyhow the matter seems to me to be worth investigating by owners of motor generator sets.

I wonder how many operators there are, out of the many thousands in America, who can honestly and truthfully say that they have studied the picture. I wonder how many operators there are who have been projecting pictures continuously for say five years who can honestly say that they have compared the action in their picture with the reality, and are therefore in a position to judge whether or not any given action on the screen is reproduced naturally or unnaturally.

I have often made the statement that the high class operator must, of necessity, have something of the artist in his composition. The unthinking and the ignorant have smiled at this statement, and some of them have laughed uproariously. But what does that quality in a man or woman consist of which makes him or her an artist? Is it not, after all is said and done, the ability and the natural tendency to closely observe nature and to be able to reproduce nature in pictures?

Of course, the word "artist" has in later years been stretched to cover almost anything from a cloak model up, but I refer here only to the older use of the word which meant a painter or a sculptor.

If the brief definition I have evolved be conceded to contain the elements of fact, then it must also be conceded that the operator must of necessity, in order to produce high class work, have something of the artist in his make up, for the very simple reason that he is continuously called upon to reproduce nature on the screen of his theater, and there is not a single action in the whole course of the play which he cannot very largely change by altering the speed of projection. If a man takes a step, and in the process of taking that step consumes one-half second of time, and the operator projects that action at a speed which will produce the original time, an entirely different effect is had, than when he projects at a speed which will cause the man to take that step in one-fourth of a second.

Theoretically all pictures are taken at a certain given rate of speed; practically, however, they are not, and the variation in speed is quite wide indeed. The whole matter of camera speed is entirely a matter of guess work on the part of the camera operator. Sometimes he will run 55 and sometimes 65 feet per minute, or he may run anything between these two figures, though I think very rarely he will go below 55, or above 65.

The operator must follow the speed of the camera if the original scene is to be reenacted at its face value, and there is only one way in which he can do this, viz: he must know when a figure, be it an animal or human, is moving naturally, and in order to accomplish this he must study movement, he must observe he must know how horses, dogs and other animals move, and how human beings move, both in their quick and in their slow actions.

It is such things as this that give that last little touch to the picture which means the difference between mediocre and high class. Often and often I have been escorted into a theater by a manager who swelled up like a pouter pigeon as he pointed to his screen and called my attention to the high class result, or what he considered was high class result. And the result was good; the light perhaps was brilliant, and well handled, but it was not high class, because no attention was being paid by the operator to the item of speed, and in some scenes figures moved too fast, while in others their movement was too slow. Yet it would be a hopeless task to make that manager understand that the result on his screen could be materially improved. As a matter of fact it could not be largely improved, but it could be so changed that the performance would be beyond criticism. It could be given that one little touch that is called the "touch of the artist."

Of course, I know it is a little early in the game to be talking about this. I might perhaps first insist upon the remedying of other more glaring evils. However, it does no harm, and, I think may probably do good to call attention, from time to time, to the finer points of projection, as well as to continually keep pounding at the cruder faults.

Moving picture operating ought to be and some day will be, I believe, one of the dignified professions. Don't smile! Some of you smiled ten years ago when told that the moving picture was going to become a fixture; some of you even guffawed and ridiculed the idea and declared the moving picture to be merely a fad. But by so doing you simply advertised the fact that you were mighty poor prophets. Four years ago some of you smiled when the writer said that the ultimate goal of the moving picture would be the play. Some of you laughed, but, nevertheless, you can go today into a theater and spend the whole evening looking at a moving picture play, and within a comparatively short time, this, in my opinion, will be the rule rather than the exception.

In the regular drama the success or failure of a play depends, not upon one man, but upon anywhere from three to twelve actors, who daily go through the program of the play. In a photoplay drama the success or failure in the last analysis depends very largely upon one man, and that one is the operator, who can place it on the screen as a magnificent production or as a bunch of jumping shadows. Therefore I say, and I repeat, that operating is of such importance that it will one day be recognized as one of the professions, and possibly one of the dignified ones too.

Needs Them.

Billy Louzon, Montreal, writes:

Enclosed find order for $2.50. For the love of Mike, send me that book by Swoope, and the first list of questions. I need them bad. All I have been doing since the questions started is to buy books on motor generators, and I have read them from one end to the other, and studied them too, and I am still at it. When the questions started I realized that it was up to me to get busy. I do not propose to be like those operators who don't think a generator or motor will ever have anything to do with their "three squares per," or a good job. If you find any other books you think good put the fellows who want to know wise to them. Those who don't want to know will wake up some day with a big bump. I might mention, in passing, that I am a Mohawk Valley Indian. Bought my Handbook a short time after they were on the market, but did not receive a picture of its author. Would very much like to have one if there are any left.

Well, brother Louzon, I wish we had more Indians like you in the operating rooms of America. It does not in the least matter to me what a man's nationality may happen to be, provided he is a real man. You are taking the right course, and if you keep it up you must certainly win out. Remember, however, that it won't do much good to learn, unless you apply the knowledge you acquire. The man who has the practical and technical knowledge and the energy to apply it, is the one who is going to get the really good jobs in the not distant future; in fact, he is getting them right now to an ever increasing extent. But, of course, no matter how much a man may know, if he has not the necessary energy to apply himself to his work, his knowledge won't count for very much. I do not mean by this to insinuate that you are in this class. By no means. I am simply re-pointing out a fact. I have found one other book on motors and generators which is very excellent indeed. You have doubtless by now seen it described in the department. There were one thousand photographs sent out with the first thousand copies, but I regret to say there are none on hand now. Good luck to you, my boy, and to all others like you.

Non-Rewindable.

D. Friedheim, Brooklyn, New York, writes:

Would you please express your opinion of a non-rewindable picture film which I have just completed? What I mean by non-rewindable film is that after the operator has run off the picture he would not have to take it off the machine, but could show it over again without stopping.

I could not express any opinion at all, brother Friedheim, without having first seen the device in operation. There have been something like fifty devices of this kind invented, but none of them were commercially practical. Show me what you have and I will tell you then whether it is a practical proposition or not.

Good Work.

By invitation of Mr. Raymond, I recently visited the Carnegie Lyceum, where I thoroughly enjoyed that magnificent produciton, "Les Miserables." It was indeed a beautiful thing. Projection was in charge of William C. Gluck, who did not know of my presence, at least until the show was more than half over. I must congratulate Mr. Gluck on his work, and I particularly congratulate him in view of the fact that he is working under enormous difficulties. The screen was brilliant and during the entire two and a half hours there was hardly a discoloration of the light to be seen, yet brother Gluck has no observation port at all, and is compelled to peer through the lens hole in order to see his projection. The man who can, and will, produce good work under such conditions is certainly some operator. The equipment consists of two Simplex machines. The lack of observation ports is not the fault of any one, nor can the defect be remedied immediately, though it is to be hoped that by another year the projection in the Carnegie Lyceum will not be thus hampered.

Knowledge Galore.

Arthur Ayers, Bellefontaine, Ohio, orders a Handbook, list of questions and "Lessons in Practical Electricity," which is ample evidence that brother Ayers has, in the language of the cullud brudder, "done woke up." He says:

> I think these questions are one of the best things ever offered to operators, and it cannot help but be beneficial to the business in general. Would it be advisable for an operator in a small town like this (8,000 population) to join the union? I could not even think of attending meetings, as it is too far away, Cleveland being the nearest place I know of. Springfield and Dayton are closer, but I do not know whether or not they are organized. We try to put on good projection here all the time, but think it will be improved when new equipment is installed in the city light plant which has been badly overloaded for lo these many moons. I saw one of Lyman Howe's shows in Springfield recently, and to say the projection was fine is putting the matter lightly. When I returned home my own picture looked very punk to me. I would like to ask if the course in motion picture work at the Syracuse University would be of any benefit to the operator. The description of Kinemacolor you promised some time ago has not yet appeared, and I wondered if it had slipped your mind or whether other things were more pressing.

Very likely brother Ayers was like hundreds of other small town operators who believe their projection is pretty nifty, and very nearly perfect, until they have an opportunity of viewing the real thing. It is to be noticed that friend Ayers' order for the questions and two books, amounting to $4.75 all told, came shortly after he saw the possibilities of projection. It woke him up. By this I do not mean that he was non-progressive before, but that most likely he didn't realize the possibilities for improvement in his own work. As to joining the union I don't like to advise in a case of this kind, but I know that were I in your place I would follow the example of the banker, the lawyer, the doctor and the artist and join the union of my craft, if it were possible to do so. As to the course in the Syracuse University I know nothing of it. As to Kinemacolor: I simply cannot spare the space.

A Question.

I. H. Gray, Minneapolis, Minn., says:

> Here is a question to which I wish you would give an answer, if you have one: I own my theater, and run my own machine, for which I am called unfair, though one of the managers of the Elk Theater claims to be a union operator, and still he runs his own projector. The argument against the owner running his own machine is that it does not "give the operator a chance to live." But don't you think "self preservation is nature's first law," also that "Charity begins at home?" Moreover, don't you believe these quotations can be applied to my own case? I am living in two 8 x 10 rooms in a flat upstairs. I buy just the plainest grub. Why? Because I want to make about 3% on my investment. I don't tell everyone my business, therefore the union seems to think I have a "gold mine," and that the gold ought to be spelled with a capital G, and that they ought to have the right to foist any tramp operator on me at any time, and all that I should do is to dig up the sixteen bones for twenty-four hours' work, and then smile, and keep right on smiling whether I have the amount in the bank to meet my obligations or not. I have met several union men here, and believe me or not, as you will, but the very first question every one of them asked was: "Have you a motor drive?" "No." The next query made was: "Motor rewind?" "No." Whereupon followed the remark: "Well, old chap, if I worked for you you would sure get a motor."

There is considerable more red-hot talk in friend Gray's letter. Replying to his queries I will say that under the rules of the I. A. T. S. E. the owner is not allowed to operate his own machine unless he belongs to the operators' union. However, as I understand the matter, owners who operate their own machines may be and are admitted to the union under certain conditions. Whether you would be eligible for membership or not, I cannot say, but I think not. However, I hardly think the Minneapolis union would seek to "foist a tramp operator" on friend Gray, but he cannot expect to get a high class man at $16.00 a week. (I assume that he means he is running a total of twenty-four hours a week, or four hours a day). The proposition, neighbor Gray, is this: even though you may only have four hours' work a day for your operator, a man could not very well do anything else. You could not expect him to hold a job at something else and work four hours a day in your theater and give you good service; therefore he must make his living at your theater, and he will not burn up very much gasoline, or sport many diamonds on $16.00 a week. While I can, to some extent, appreciate your point of view, still my own idea is that, in a city like Minneapolis, houses which cannot exist and employ a competent operator at a minimum salary of say, $20.00 a week have mighty small excuse for existing at all. I am a firm believer in the operator being fair to the owner and manager; I insist upon it, and I insist upon the operators' unions being fair (which they by no means always are) but, on the other hand, I insist on the manager being fair to the operator, and, while I cheerfully concede both the legal and the moral right of a man to run his own machine in a small town, I cannot concede the same right in a city. The operator whose first question is "Have you a motor?" simply advertises himself as an incompetent—incompetent by reason of the fact that the first thing he thinks of is his own ease, and the man who takes that view is never a competent man in all that that term implies. He has a large, well developed bump of laziness.

Now, I presume friend Gray will be angry with me as well as the union, but he asked for an expression of my opinion and he has it. I may say, however, that, up to date, I have seen very little evidence that the Minneapolis union is a progressive body. I do not say that it is not a progressive body, mind you, but simply it has not furnished any large amount of evidence of the fact if it is.

An Excellent Plan.

James V. Bryson, manager of the Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, is sending out blanks, presumably with each one of their reels. On the back of the blank it says (condensed):

> In asking you to lend your co-operation in reporting condition of films, we believe that it is something that will react for your own good, as well as for the good of the business in general, including your manager, your patrons, and this office. When we ask if a film needs renovating, we would like your answer; yes or no. We have established a film renovating plant at large expense. We have not expended this money just for the fun of it, but for the good of the business, and because we are trying to deliver the goods. If you find anything wrong with our films we want to know what it is, and what particular reel it applies to. If our splices are bad we want to know of it, so we can locate the seat of the trouble, and discipline the employee responsible, if it be due to negligence. If our cement is not holding we want to know it. If there are not enough leaders and titles we want to know it. In fact we want a fair chance to correct any mistakes. Remember there is not a single report which comes back to this office which is not properly checked and filed.
> On the other side of the blank are four columns reading as follows: Operator's Report No. ————, Name of operator ————. Name of theater ————. City ————. State ————. Date ————. Number and name of subject ————. General Condition ————. Does the film need renovating? ———— Were there enough leaders and titles?———— Do you find irregular splicing and out of frames? ———— Any other suggestions you may have to make? ————.

Now here is something that looks like the real goods. Mr. Bryson is, so far as I know, the first one to establish this kind of a report system. The scheme spells just plain horse sense. Such a report ought to be required from the operator on every reel of film he handles. It would make the work of exchange inspectors easier, and would serve as a check on many abuses. My compliments to friend Bryson. His example is one which all other film exchange managers might well follow.

My Mistake.

California writes:

> I note in February 21st issue, you say to M. W. Reed, Charles City, Iowa, there is no double three-wing inside shutter for the Motiograph. For this I will be obliged, to use your own expression, to slap you on the wrist real hard, for know ye that every Motiograph in San Francisco is thusly equipped, and the result is a flickerless picture, although more juice must be used. J. Delbert, of San Francisco, makes this shutter, among other good things.

Very well, brother, our wrist smarts right now from that strenuous long distance slap. We stand corrected and our pride is properly humbled. I understand J. Delbert will soon place the condenser mounts I recommended on the market, and, in my judgment, they are going to be a mighty good thing to invest in.

Slide Coating.

H. A. McBride, Ellwood City, Pennsylvania, says that he has been using the following slide coating for more than a year and that it is the cheapest, quickest, and best he has found so far: Mix lampblack with turpentine, being careful not to get it too thin. Apply to a clean glass with a camel hair brush, and let it dry. Then, by breaking off one blade of a pen you can write or draw anything you wish, and it will show up white on the screen. For which information brother McBride is duly thanked.

Won't Do.

Oroville, California, says:

> Having seen many slide suggestions in the department, I am sending you a slide, which is very easy to make, and which looks much better than any I have yet seen. The material is celluloid, such as is used in automobile buggy tops.

While the slide looks fine, and will probably show up well, I cannot recommend it since celluloid is highly inflammable, and, while this particular variety does not burn as readily as a moving picture film, still, if one of our inspectors were in New York City caught you with them in an operating room he would undoubtedly take your license away. I am sorry, Oroville, for while the scheme, and your method of binding particularly, does credit to your ingenuity, still, for the reason named it won't do. If you would substitute mica it would work fine. The holder submitted is unique and effective. It consists of two pieces of cardboard, slide size, with their centers cut out like a slide mat; they are then laid face to face and bound together on one end and two sides with gummed binder strips, the celluloid being shoved in at one end. The holder part is fine and would work well, as I said, with mica.

Simplex Factory Enlarged.

By invitation of H. B. Coles, general manager of the Precision Machine Company, manufacturer of the Simplex Machine, I recently visited its factory. I had not been up there for fully six months, and was more than astonished at what I saw. When Frank Cannock, inventor of the Simplex projector, first started manufacturing that article he had one side of one floor and a few machines,—lathes, etc., I mean. The last time I was there he was all swelled up over the fact that he occupied a whole floor of the building. When I went there this time, however, I told the cullud gemmen, who is chief engineer, stoker and pilot of the elevator, that I wanted to go to the Precision Machine Company. At the 9th floor I saw "Simplex" on the door and made a move to get off, but the aforesaid engineer of the flying machine stopped me with the remark "You all wants to go to the office, don't you?" When I reached the 11th floor I again saw the legend "Simplex" on the door, and again my eagerness was repressed; I finally found the offices on the 12th floor.

The Precision Machine Company now occupies three whole floors of a large building and needs more space. It has fitted up the factory in a remarkably complete manner, everything being well made and substantial, which amply proves that the Precision Machine Company and the "Simplex" is here to stay. Friend Cannock took me through the factory, and I was much interested in the number and variety of the machines installed for the making of the "Simplex". He has some new, late-type machines the like of which I have never before seen, and although the factory is well laid out and is as well and completely equipped as any I have ever seen of its size. The assembling room on the 12th floor is what I would call an ideal factory room. It is right under the roof, and to all intents and purposes the whole thing is skylight; the lighting is almost perfect: the most remote corner is as bright as though it lay right beside a window. Mr. Cannock is entitled to a great deal of credit for what he has done. It is only a plain statement of fact to say that he is a mechanical genius. He is now working on, and has almost completed an amateur moving picture camera. It is his last "child" and he is as proud of it as a kid is of a new tin horn. He has invented, and will presently have ready for the market, a new lamp, lamp house and condenser mount. The lamp and the condenser mount are remarkable pieces of work, particularly the latter. I believe it will go far towards stopping condenser breakage and solving the problem of the proper condensing of the light. Mr. Cannock also has invented a camera speed regulator. This regulator was built especially for the "Simplex" camera, but can be adapted to any camera, and I am insisting that he make this device available to film producers at once. By its use the camera action would always be exactly, or practically 60 per minute, and this would solve one of the most strenuous difficulties confronting the operator. General Manager Coles has accomplished wonders since he took the helm. Coles is not only a "rattling good feller" but he is also a splendid salesman and has also proven himself to be some manager.

Simplex Improvement.

H. B. Coles, general manager of the Precision Machine Company, informs this department that that company is now able to furnish Simplex machine pedestals made in aluminum castings, instead of iron castings. These are intended for road shows. The weight of the aluminum pedestals is 48 pounds as against 134 in cast iron. Their price is $25.00.

This is a decided improvement. The old cast iron pedestals made the Simplex machine practically unavailable for road use, since a chunk of cast iron weighing 134 pounds is an unwieldy thing to handle. The aluminum pedestals will place the Simplex in line for road show work.

From Detroit.

A member of Local 199, Detroit, Michigan, writes:

> Not seeing any news from Little Old Detroit I take the liberty of saying Hello! Conditions are very good here, everything considered; though they could, of course, and I am sure will, in time, be better. In the houses consenting to the use of a 199 slide, projection is excellent, but in some of the non-union houses the work is what I would call artistically rotten, using that term for the lack of more appropriate phrase. If square dealing on the part of L. U. 199 will do any good, I confidently expect to see all the better houses displaying the slide before the end of the year. We have an excellent local and are trying to improve all the time. Our president, Mr. Ray Branch, is a 1914 model, built more for speed than comfort. So far as troubles are concerned I have none just now, but—you never can tell. Where in the name of the New Jerusalem do they unearth some of these so called "inspectors" of moving picture theaters? Our state inspector is a prince, but, oh you subordinates!

I am glad to listen to a talk like this. Square dealing, brother, is the only thing, and will win out in the long run. It may take a little more time than the strong-arm method, but the progress made will be more substantial and its results will last longer. Of course, there are times when force must be used, but force is the weapon of savagery. I trust 199 will continue to prosper. More power to you, and may your shadow never grow less. As to where the examples of ivory dome, misnamed "inspectors," come from—you can search me.

Reducing Negative.

Charles D. Smith, Canton, Illinois, says:

> With regard to Mr. Stern's article in February 7th issue, I disagree with him that the best slides are made by contact printing. When a slide is projected to the screen it is hugely magnified, and will lose considerable of its detail. Now when a slide is made from a large negative, by the reduction process, it is reduced and becomes much sharper, and, as you will agree, will be sharper when it is projected to the screen. As to developing, you are wrong in saying that any developer will do, since slides must have a special formula.

I agree with neighbor Smith's remarks regarding reduction. I think myself that is the best plan. I stand corrected on the developer. I had already found out I was wrong in that respect.

From Canton, Ohio.

Fred R. Klink, Canton, Ohio, has the following to say:

> Not having seen any letters from this neck of the woods recently I thought it well to let you know we are still alive. Are any Power's Six operators having trouble with their oil casings? We have two machines and the covers of both cases have sprung. I could not make shellac hold, so I cut a washer from a piece of rubber packing and put it in. I also drilled and tapped a hole in another part of the casing and thus stopped the trouble. I have been operating for ten years, and am just beginning to discover the fact that I still have plenty to learn. With regard to the questions: I cannot answer them on paper, but in the majority of cases I could locate the trouble and fix it. I was two years on the road with the Edison Motion Picture Company, of Washington, D. C., in 1905-06, and have handled almost all currents from 50 a. c. to 550 d. c. I have made application for a patent on a little apparatus, and as soon as the device is ready for the market I will send one for your approval. Some time ago an operator spoke of the bearings of the crankshaft on his Six A wearing on one side. Our machines have been running since June, 1913, and both show excessive wear on the sides of the crankshaft bearings. We have a 3 h.p. 220 volt d. c. motor on our vent fan; it has about 1½ inches end play. Don't you think this excessive?

It certainly is. It is something more than excessive. As to the Power's oil casing, there has been little or no trouble of the kind you mention reported, although there are more than 12,000 of those machines out. Yes, brother Klink, we all have lots to learn. I am learning every day, and I expect to go right on doing it for years to come. If you can locate the troubles and fix them there is no reason why you could not answer the questions, and perhaps practice in putting them on paper would be beneficial to you. I will be glad to look over your invention when it is ready, and sincerely trust you may make at least a couple of millions out of it.

Intermittent Movement.

Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, writes:

> Attached hereto find answer to question 20. Regarding recent article on intermittent speed, I want to say that any movement that pulls the film across the aperture in 1-96 of a second when running at the rate of 16 pictures per second is a six to one movement, and gives the complete shift of the film in 1-6 of a picture interval. The geneva is probabiy the best movement made, for the reason that it starts the film slowly, increasing the speed to a maximum then decreasing until the film comes slowly to rest. It is very gentle on weak films. It is capable of construction in such proportion than any desired ratio of time of movement, as compared with time of rest, may be attained. A 4 to 1 is a movement that pulls the film across the aperture in 1-64 of a second, thus consuming 1-4 of a picture interval in a movement when running 16 pictures per second.

I do not remember the article referred to, but brother Smith's comments are worth the space I think. I agree with him that the geneva type of movement is the best yet evolved, assuming, however, that he includes in the term "geneva" the Power's Six movment, it being a type of geneva movement. Of course when he says it starts the film slowly, brings its speed up to maximum and then brings it gently to rest, he means slowly by comparison, and viewed that way he is entirely correct. It sounds queer however, to speak of "slow" and "gentle" in connection with sixteen movements per second.

Information Wanted.

George J. Rapp, manager Cozy Theater, Shelbyville, Indiana, writes:

> Am using two Power's Six A projectors and 30 ampers of d.c. from a G. E. generator set. Am using two-way switches, as we cannot pull two arcs at once. Result is very poor. Have been figuring on installing 50 ampere generator set, but the Indianapolis branch of the General Film Company argues that two arcs cannot be pulled from a 50 ampere generator at one and the same time.

The General Film Company is in error. If you are using only 30 amperes you can or should be able to pull two 30 ampere arcs from a 50 ampere generator, provided, of course, it be compound-wound, as are the generators of all motor-generator sets. This would overload the generator by less than 25%, and any well constructed generator ought to stand that, though it would not be good practice to keep it thus continuously overloaded. However, you could so arrange your resistance that toward the end of the film when you want to strike both arcs you could introduce a little extra resistance and temporarily cut down the amperage of each one to 25, thus keeping within the capacity of your generator. You would get better results from your present equipment, I think, by connecting your lamps in multiple with each other.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

News and Views of Houses Here and There.

THEATER PRINCESS, SUPERIOR, WISCONSIN.

ONE of the newest motion picture theaters to be opened recently in Superior, Wis., is the Theater Princess at 1310 Tower Avenue. The house is owned and managed by the Northland Theater Company, consisting of Frank C. Buckley and John Erbellding. The structure is built entirely of fireproof material, and its appointments are such as could be compared with any leading theaters of a big metropolis. The cement floors, aisles, passageways and stairs are nicely carpeted. The ceilings average about twenty-five feet in height. Although the Princess is operated as a high-class picture house, a large stage with scenery and a fly loft nearly fifty feet high was provided. The dressing-rooms are underneath the stage. On the mezzanine floor is the operating room with two boxes on each side. Also situated on this floor is the business office.

Theater Princess, Superior, Wis.

The indirect lighting system is used, and also large art glass chandeliers. The facade is outlined in hundreds of electric lights. The flag-pole is also illuminated. The ventilation system consists of a large intake pipe running from the roof. This pipe connects with hot steam coils which warms the air. The air is then sent into the auditorium through many openings in the ceilings, walls and floors. The foul air is drawn out by big exhaust fans and a blower. All the fittings and furnishings installed in the Princess were bought of advertisers in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and the managers say they are giving entire satisfaction.

Mr. Buckley has had a number of years' experience in the amusement line, having managed the Grand Opera House at Superior for ten years. Just before opening the Princess Theater, he traveled throughout Europe, Japan, China, India and other parts of the world. What he learned in those parts were of material benefit to him in building the Princess.

THE PEKING PAVILION, TIENTSIN, CHINA.

The accompanying illustration shows the Peking Pavilion, a moving picture theater in Tientsin, China, in course of construction. It is owned by the Arcade Amusement Company, of Tientsin. The theater is situated on the Austrian Glacis, just in the center of the Legation Quarters, and adjoins the Mexican Legation. In a letter to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, the Arcade Company says that it expects to do a big business with the house.

"In order to make the pictures intelligible to the Chinese, we had all the titles and sub-titles of several features such as 'Father,' 'On the Steps of the Throne,' 'Fantomas,' etc., translated into Chinese by Henri Adolph Muller, of Hamburg. You know what amount of work and expense this means," says the Arcade Company, in its letter.

The Peking Pavilion, Tientsin, China.

Continuing, the company says, "When are the producers going to make any improvement in their style of producing films? The abrupt changes of scenes from one to another is, as it seems to us, a very crude way of doing it. The strain on the spectator's eyes is too much. Do you not think it would be much better if they were to dissolve one scene into the other? Features of three and four reels are being released by the score weekly and not a few of them are padded to make up the length. Perhaps the idea of dissolving the scenes will give the producers a chance of lengthening the films without allowing the plot and action to drag."

REX THEATER, VALLEY CITY, N. D.

A nice small theater in a small town is the Rex Theater at Valley City, N. D. It has a seating capacity of 276. The fire marshal announced that its booth is one of the best in the state. Two machines are used. The orchestra of five pieces is situated behind the screen while the pictures are being shown. A pipe organ is also used.

STARLAND THEATER, ST. CLOUD, MINN.

The Starland Theater, St. Cloud, Minn., is one of the best picture houses in the Northwest, architecturally speaking. The outside measurements of this fireproof structure are 44 by 132 feet. The front of the house is faced with "tapestry" pressed brick, and the trimmings are of granite, with terra cotta standards. Upon these standards are electric globes with each one containing a number of small electric lights with the middle standard supporting the flag pole.

The design in the brick in the lobby conforms with that outside, it being arranged in panel fashion, and is of tapestry manufacture. Beautiful oil paintings brighten the lobby which is 14 by 20 feet in size. The ticket office is done in art-glass grill work. The lobby floor is of red tile, and the doors leading into the main auditorium are leather covered.

Lobby of the Starland Theater, St. Cloud, Minn.

The floor of the auditorium is of cement with green wainscotting up to the chair rail. On each side of the auditorium there are three painted pictures, which are bordered with plaster-paris gilt edge mouldings. These paintings are set between pilasters and give a very pleasing effect to the auditorium. In the ceiling are grill ventilators. The seating capacity is 900, and there are no poles or other obstructions to impair the view of anybody in the house.

The proscenium arch is of plaster-paris composition with gold trimmings and rosettes, eighteen inches apart. In the center of each rosette is a frosted electric globe. The size of the stage is 26 feet deep by 42 feet wide. There are six dressing rooms with running water in each. In the operating room, which is 9 by 16 feet, there are two machines, a Power's 6A and a 1914 Simplex, and two spot lights. The lighting of the entire house is controlled from the booth, and the indirect system is employed.

The house is owned and managed by F. E. Nemec, who is also the owner of the Princess Theater, St. Cloud; the Milo Theater, Little Falls, Minn., and the Scenic Theater, Detroit, Mich. A brief sketch of the career of Mr. Nemec will not be out of place. When he came to St. Cloud he observed that the people were in want of high-class amusement, and although the outlook was rather opaque, he opened the Princess on May 5, 1910. He stayed at the original quarters of the Princess until December 6, the same year, when the Adams Building, which had been remodeled and renovated, was ready for occupancy. He moved the Princess into this new building with the result that he opened a finer theater with larger seating capacity. The second opening of the Princess was auspicious, and continues to do a big business. Being a man of keen insight into the profits to be made from a well conducted picture house, he opened on August 1, 1911, the Milo Theater, in Little Falls, Minn. Then on October 21st of the same year, he bought the Grand Theater, in Brainerd, Minn., which he conducted for a year and then sold. On January 8, 1912, he opened the Scenic Theater, in Detroit, Mich., which he still operates. February 21, 1912, saw the opening of the Princess Theater, Valley City, N. D., by Mr. Nemec. After conducting this house for a year he sold it only to open the Crystal Theater, in Alexandria, Minn., which he disposed of after operating it for about a year and a half. He also ran opera houses in Melrose and Sauk Centre, Minn., which played to road attractions and moving pictures. Mr. Nemec has also started theaters in Albany, Royalton and Monticello, Minn. He then built the Grand Theater, at Botenaux, N. D., and later disposed of it. At Staples, Minn., he conducted the Grand Theater for about eight months, when he subrented it, but still controls the lease.

PALACE THEATER, WASECA, MINN.

B. E. Dawson has dispelled the apprehension that a moving picture theater in a small town is not a paying proposition. Even though the house is a well-conducted and enticing amusement resort, some people contend that it would die for lack of patronage. Mr. Dawson opened, sometime ago, a moving picture theater in a town with 3,000 inhabitants; the house has a seating capacity of 500. There is also a stage, 25 by 44 feet in size to accommodate traveling shows. As the accompanying illustration shows, the structure is built of brick, and is two stories in height. The dimensions of the building are 125 by 46 feet. It cost Mr. Dawson $22,000 to erect the Palace, which is the name of his picture theater. It is modern in every way; is electrically lighted, and has plenty of dressing-rooms. A Radium Gold Fibre screen is used. A Simplex machine projects the pictures of the General Film Company's program.

PEOPLE'S THEATER OPENED.

The moving picture theater located in Tower Avenue, between Broadway and Eleventh Street, Superior, Wis., opened on St. Patrick's Day. N. LaPage, who is the manager of the house, opened it with "The Lion and the Mouse," a General Film Company release. The theater has been built along lines of safety, and every convenience for its patrons has been provided for. It is known as the "People's," and has a very pretty front.

THE EMPIRE THEATER, MOBILE, ALA.

Beautifully constructed and handsomely furnished moving picture theaters are springing up all over the United States. Mostly every big city in the various States can boast of a picture theater beautiful, and now comes the news that the Bijou Amusement Company, Inc., 220 Dauphin Street, Mobile, Ala., has added another first-class picture house to the category of the picture theater beautiful. This new company is composed of J. B. Webster, president; Joseph Bianchi, vice-president and general manager and inventor of the Bianchi camera, and M. Luckel, secretary. The house cost in the neighborhood of $54,000 to construct, and judging from the illustrations accompanying this article every penny seems to have been well spent. Before the house was opened the company offered $25 in gold for a suitable name for the place, and Mrs. J. H. Smith, of Mobile, won the prize for suggesting the name "Empire."

The massive masonry of the exterior, the herald and heraldess with raised trumpets, and the artistic arrangement of lights give the front a very impressive appearance. The lobby is done in genuine Italian marble and the entrance and exit contain cut glass with art glass above. According to report the Empire is the largest picture house in Mobile. The auditorium is 108 feet long by 30 feet wide, and it has a seating capacity of 600.

The subject of sanitation had been given a great deal of attention in the planning of the building, with the result that it is "the most sanitary building in the city or vicinity," as stated in a little booklet issued by the company. There is no drapery of any kind in the theater. The seats are of mahoganized birch upholstered in Spanish Moroccoline. The ventilation system consists of three powerful exhausts with a drawing capacity of thirty-three thousand cubic feet of air per minute.

Especially large exits which are marked with red lights open out from the theater in front and in the rear. These are four in number, and the whole auditorium may be emptied of all people through these exits in a very few minutes. The operating room is lined entirely with sheet iron and asbestos which makes it positively fireproof, and it has a brick wall thirteen inches thick separating it from the auditorium. The dimensions of the room are 10 by 12 feet, with a ceiling height of twelve feet including a large skylight for air, giving health and comfort to the operators. The Simplex and the Kinemacolor Simplex machine are used, and the pictures are projected upon a $1,000 mirror screen, the dimensions of which are 13 by 17 feet. The lighting arrangements comply with State laws and city ordinances, and every inch of electrical wiring has been done in conduits.

The Empire opens at 10 o'clock in the forenoon and runs until 11 at night. General Film Company service is used and an orchestra of seven high class musicians dispenses the music. Special musical selections are given daily from 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m., and from 7:00 to 10:00 p.m. As far as we know a unique and distinctively novel innovation has been inaugurated in the management of the Empire, which is that the house is open one day each week to its patrons when they will be shown by courteous attendants the operating room, the working of the machines—in fact, anything that they may wish to know regarding projection, the film, etc.

EMPRESS THEATER, CHEWELAH, WASH.

In the little town of Chewelah, Wash., which has a population of only 1,000 inhabitants, T. Y. Brownlow has been successfully conducting for the past two years the Empress Theater. Mr. Brownlow says in a letter to the Moving Picture World that his attempt to maintain a picture house in the town is the fourth one, his predecessors having been unsuccessful. Ever since opening the attendance has been good.

The house is equipped with its own electric light plant, which consists of a gasoline engine and a 3 k. w. generator; a very good clear picture is the result. The seating capacity of the Empress Theater is three hundred. The chairs were bought of the A. H. Andrews Company, of Chicago, Ill.

The admission prices are ten cents for children and fifteen cents for adults. Mr. Brownlow at the request of a number of persons who thought that the prices were too high lowered them; but the change did not result in larger crowds. Then he put on a special entertainment at twenty-five cents and jammed the house to capacity at every show. Which only goes to show, Mr. Brownlow says, that it is not the admission price the people are interested in, but the kind of entertainment you give them.

Mr. Brownlow is running Selig's "Adventures of Kathlyn" and he says that he has broke all his week-night records. The series is in great demand.

The GREAT DIAMOND ROBBERY

with WALLACE EDDINGER

and a supporting company of Broadway favorites upon its special matinee presentation at the American Theatre, Saturday morning last.

EXTRACT FROM MOVING PICTURE WORLD:

"Playgoers Film Company makes its debut in a stirring six-part melodrama, enacted by a fine cast. Daniel V. Arthur unquestionably makes a fine showing in the six-part subject. It is good story of the sort that will interest, and at times thrill, the present day orchestra, even as it must have old-time playgoers. The cast is excellent—composed of seasoned players. The settings are such as we have a right to expect in a good or pre-

MORNING TELEGRAPH:

"Daniel V. Arthur has engaged a company, composed almost entirely of Broadway favorites, for whom this is the first venture into the motion picture field. In picking Miss Gail Kane for the adventuress, Mr. Arthur has shown that his long experience in the 'legitimate' has given him a wizardly intuition as to the casting of a play. Wallace Eddinger as the detective-hero has a role very similar

THE NEW YORK HERALD:

"'The Great Diamond Robbery' has a love story that reaches out for the heart-strings of even the man who has been out of the love business for a score of years. There is beauty of women and constant change of scenery. Every member of the cast, if called upon, could play his or her part in Broadway."

tentious production. It is the natural thing they should be, considering they were under the direction of Edward A. Morange. Wallace Eddinger as Dick Brummage, the detective, has adventures a-plenty—he is virile, enthusiastic, and he has magnetism. He has much to do, and does it well. Gail Kane has the part of a Brazillian adventuress. It is a remarkably fine portrayal she gives us—is fully entitled to rank as a photo-play star. Chas. J. Ross as Mr. Bulford gives a finished performance. Elita Proctor Otis as Mother Rosenbaum, a 'fence,' plays the part finely. Others in the large cast who had much to do were Martin J. Alsop, Stapleton Kent, Herbert Barrington, Edward Gillespie, Dorothy Arthur and Percy Standing. The situations in the play rouse the blood. It is melodrama triumphant."

to that in 'Officer 666,' in which he made such a hit last year, and he plays it as well as anything he has ever done on the boards. The settings are deep, solidly built and beautifully tinted; in other words, they look like what they are meant to be, and not merely pieces of stage scenery. When we see that the production was made under the art direction of Edward A. Morange, of 'Kismet' fame, we do not wonder at this, however. Considered from every angle, 'The Great Diamond Robbery' proves to be an unqualified photo-play triumph."

MOTION PICTURE NEWS:

"'The Great Diamond Robbery' is proof that the grand old successes of ten or twenty years ago can 'come back' and repeat their stage triumph on the screen of today. Didn't get a chance to draw a full breath between the first act and the finale. Gail Kane's portrayal makes Maria a veritable Vampire, comparable to 'The Woman Who Didn't Care,' in 'A Fool There Was.' Neither Beatrice Henderson nor Katherine Kaelred could have surpassed her."

This is positively the Best Acted, Best Picturized, Most Elaborately Staged and Grippingly Interesting Photo-play that has Ever Been Produced.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE annual meeting of the stockholders of the Interstate Amusement Company will be held in the office of the company, at 307 Ninth street, Northwest, on Saturday, April 4, at 4 o'clock.

A movement is on foot to erect an amusement palace in this city at a cost of $500,000. The first floor of the building is to be devoted to stores while the other floors will house a moving picture theater with a seating capacity of 500, bowling alleys, pool and billiard rooms and a large convention hall.

Motion pictures showing the Persian minister at the dedicatory ceremonies of the Panama-Pacific exposition, views of portions of the exposition grounds, and a full sized view of the Persian flag were part of the special entertainment provided on the occasion of a visit of Mme. Ali Kuli Khad, wife of the Persian minister, as hostess, and a party of friends at the Cosmos Theater recently. Another feature of the entertainment was the exhibition of a number of marvelous tricks by Mirza Khan bin Abdallah, a Persian magician.

The Virginia Theater on Ninth street, Northwest, has been remodeled, the interior improvement consisting of new decorations, electric lights, tiling, etc. An ice plant and a new ventilation system has been ordered for later installation for the comfort of the patrons during the summer months.

Simon Wolf, president of the Washington branch of the Anti-Defamation League, is drafting a bill to establish a board of censors to pass upon moving pictures and theatrical productions shown within the District of Columbia. The measure, it is stated, is in line with the effort to elevate the moral tone of the stage and to insure to Washington theatergoers and patrons of the moving picture house the presentation of only such plays and films as are calculated to work no injury to morals and manners. According to Mr. Wolf, the commissioners of the District of Columbia have given assurances that they will promptly forward the bill to Congress and recommend its enactment into law. The measure would vest in the board of censors and the police department powers similar to those granted the same authorities in Chicago.

When interviewed on the subject of censorship, Commissioner Siddons stated he did not know whether the Board of District Commissioners had the authority to appoint a board of censorship as proposed, but if the authority exists, that it would be premature to discuss to what extent it should be exercised, if at all, because so far the matter has not been considered by the commissioners. "Speaking for myself," he said, "there are some general considerations which should not be lost sight of in a discussion of the subject. The idea of censorship has never been popular in America and with good reason, for it partakes too much of certain old theories of government control over the free expression of ideas and opinions, not at all in harmony with our governmental policy, and the exercise of the power of censorship is apt to awaken a fear of interference with that freedom of speech and of the press that should always be jealously guarded in a nation maintaining free political institutions. Within proper limitations, however, suggested by the foregoing, it ought to be possible for the public authorities to check the production or exhibition of forms of entertainment that are scurrilous and tend to subject to public ridicule classes of citizens or cherished ideals that may be advocated by groups of them."

The District Commissioners have promised officials of the local Exhibitors' League that public hearings shall be given to the exhibitors should the matter demand further consideration. When interviewed by a Moving Picture World correspondent President Herbst, of the League, stated that he did not think that in this city a board of censorship was at all needed. "Due to the efficiency of the National Board of Censorship," he said, "Very few commercial films are released to which any one could take offense. However, we have been assured of a hearing should the agitation become such as to make an investigation by the commissioners necessary."

The exhibitors seem to be having more trouble at the present time than they have had for many months, for in addition to the possibility of the inauguration of a censorship board, they are facing agitation on the part of a number of cranks to secure the closing of all places of amusements on Sunday. At the present time Washington is a sort of churchyard on every day and to close the picture houses on Sunday would more strongly emphasize the fact. However, according to one well known exhibitor, "'It is up to the individual exhibitor to keep his theater going in as quiet a way as possible on the Sabbath and to show only films that are above reproach." The enactment of such blue-law legislation would work havoc with the moving picture business here.

The Orpheum Amusement Company, of Alexandria, Va., which will operate a theater and moving picture business, has been granted a charter by the State Corporation Commission. The capital stock of the corporation is from $500 to $5,000 and its officers are: H. S. Elkins, president; Cecil K. Sherman, treasurer, Alexandria, Va., and C. G. Grossman, secretary and manager, of Washington, D. C.

Minnie Burke, a burlesque actress, gave an exhibition of toe dancing down the steps of the Capitol for the benefit of an enterprising camera man, but was haled into court and forced to lose $25 which she had deposited for her appearance to answer to a charge of disorderly conduct. Her diaphanous costume was the subject of some comment.

Moving picture producers are doing much to create enthusiasm, or rather to increase the "movie craze," by having printed in both the "Herald" and "Times," local daily papers, stories of the films in advance of their being shown at local theaters. These stories are illustrated with pictures of various scenes and with portraits of the leading characters. One of the papers goes still further by giving the story the same day the film is released here.

C. L. LINZ.

KENTUCKY.

TWENTY-FIVE cent moving pictures were inaugurated in Louisville on March 22 by the Broadway Amusement Company, operating in the Walnut Theater, a converted "legitimate" house. The opening attraction was the four-part Biograph feature film "Judith of Bethulia." Crowded houses testified to the popularity of a film of this kind. It is hard to conjecture at this time whether the project will be successful and local moving-picture owners are watching the innovation with considerable interest. The Broadway Company is going into it with sufficient experience, being the owner of a number of local houses which have proven highly profitable. One of the attractions of the house is a $10,000 Wurlitzer unit orchestra. Organ recitals are given at 2:15 and 2:45 o'clock daily, except Sunday. Box seats are being sold at 50 cents, but the rest of the house is twenty-five cents.

Rumors have been current of the establishment of a number of airdomes on the outskirts of Louisville. If all the propositions that have been started "pan out" there will be fifteen or twenty open-air theaters established this summer. It is believed the city is "ripe" for this kind of enterprise. There has been nothing of this sort on any elaborate scale, although a few airdomes have been opened at various times.

Miss B. A. Plessinger, manager of the Independent Motion Picture Service Company, Louisville, is highly pleased with her move to new offices on the sixth floor of the Inter-Southern Building. She does not have as much room as in her old quarters in the Urban building, but she considers the location more advantageous.

M. Switow, president of the Switow Amusement Company, Louisville, has returned to that city from a recent trip to Indianapolis. Nothing more has been heard of his reported intention to open new picture houses in the Hoosier City. He states that business at the present time is slow in the country houses. There are two reasons for this, one being Lent and the other being the bad roads, which recent rains and snows have rendered almost impassable in many sections. As a result the farmers are unable to come to town, and business in all lines suffers.

Patrons of the Novelty Theater, Louisville, pronounced the two-part Nestor comedy feature film, "Only a Working Girl," one of the funniest films that have been produced in some time. It is almost axiomatic that two-part comedies, unlike the long dramas, are often too tedious by reason of their length; but this one was the exception to the rule and made a real hit.

Augustus Carney, in a "Universal Ike" reel, was another success of the week at the Novelty Theater. Moving picture men are hoping the good weather which has struck Kentucky in the last few days may keep up, as it has been stimulating to business.

R. S. Shrader, of the Central Film Service Company, Louisville, says that the reports which have come to him show that business is satisfactory in all the large towns of the state. One slide that has been very much in demand among the country shows of late—evidently a result of late health agitation—says, "Don't spit on the floor." Every house in his service, he says, has placed an order for this slogan.

Moving pictures of an appendicitis operation, which were taken by Carpenter & Johnson, as recently noted, were shown at the Seelbach Hotel on Friday, March 13, at the annual convention of the surgeons of the Illinois Central and Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroads. Leading physicians from all points reached by these two roads were in attendance, and they were unanimous in their praise of the reproductions and all of them declared it opened a new method of teaching surgery. So great has been the demand for reproduction of this sort, Carpenter & Johnson now intend to purchase a projecting outfit. Up to the present time they have rented machines whenever necessary, but they consider it would be more profitable to buy one.

The Princess Amusement Company, Louisville, has added a three-piece orchestra to the Columbia Theater. All of the Princess houses, including both the Orpheum and the Casino, now have orchestras, being as well equipped in this line as other theaters in the city.

The Henderson Amusement Company, owner of the Princess at Henderson, is another house which has gone in extensively for features. It now uses three features a week, Sunday, Tuesday and Friday, in addition to the regular program. By securing the best grade of films it has attracted a fine following and is doing unusually well.

A big production in the shape of the film "Hearts Adrift," a four-part feature of the Famous Players, was on the program at the Majestic at Louisville for four days. A heavy run of business was the result, the big house being packed at all times. Both Mary Pickford and Owen Moore are highly popular here.

Slides are being used by the Babies' Milk Fund to show the nature of its work. Louis Dittmar, owner of the Majestic Theater, kindly permitted the pictures to be shown at his theater. Ten pictures in all are to be shown. Some of the subjects are: "Our Future Citizens"—picture of an Italian family typical of those among whom the association works; "Doctors Visit Stations." "Lessons in Bathing," etc.

The Louisville City Salesmen's Club, which is engaged in boosting the "made-in-Louisville" movement, will raise funds by holding benefit performances at the houses operated by the Broadway Amusement Company. In addition to excellent film bills, it is planned to have vaudeville performers.

Danville will have a new motion picture show to be erected by M. G. Weisiger as part of a big four-story hotel building.

Owensboro houses are still having trouble with the advocates of a "blue-law" Sunday. One house recently gave a Sunday performance, at which no admission was charged, and religious subjects were presented. A free-will offering was taken, to which some of the spectators contributed, while others did not. The Owensboro Ministers' Alliance presented a petition to the City Council protesting against this. No action has been taken in the matter yet.

Clint Moore, a leading merchant of Ashland, will open a new picture house in that thriving little city on the Ohio river. He is now erecting a large brick building.

R. E. Gumm, owner of the Grand at Lagrange, was a recent visitor to Louisville. He has pursued the policy of coming to the city nearly every week in order to pick up the best films and new ideas. He states the weather has been a big help to business.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

THE amusement and education of the country folk is being considered as a vital part of the "Keeping the people on the farm movement" by the North Dakota Agricultural College at Fargo, N. D. At the college a miniature "Little Country Theater" has been designed. It is so constructed that it is adaptable to any sized hall. The stage settings are attractive and may be constructed from plans furnished by the college. The plan is primarily intended to encourage amateur theatricals, for the moving picture cannot overcome the liking of rural folk for giving home talent plays, but the photoplay could easily be fitted into this plan by the educators.

Chief Isermann, of Kenosha, Wis., has asked the co-operation of moving picture theater managers in eliminating all possibility of fire panics. He announced that he would call a conference of the managers to discuss a plan to keep the aisles clear and prevent overcrowding of the theaters.

Fairyland Theater on Main street, in Springfield, Ohio, was closed for two weeks when Manager Ralph Kretzer decided to install new seats, new lobby, new machines and to re-decorate.

Thomas Murray is managing the moving picture theater at Sabina, Ohio, which recently was purchased by James Whelpley.

Moving pictures of "Better Babies" were shown at the convention of the state and local health officers of Nebraska recently held at Lincoln, Neb.

WHAT was said to be one of the largest orders to have been given to any one moving picture supply house for machines has been awarded to the Calehuff Supply Company, 13th and Race streets. The order calls for twenty-four 6-A Power's machines. Mr. Calehuff reports business as thoroughly satisfactory.

Bids have been taken on the new moving picture theater which will be erected for John J. Conner, at Fifty-second and Greenway avenue, to cost about $15,000. Building, 43 by 110 feet, of Colonial architecture.

Much agitation has been aroused among the members of the local Moving Picture Operators' Union as the result of some of the exhibitors employing moving picture operators under 16 years of age, which is in direct conflict with the rules of the Union. The local Union members have drawn up and endorsed a bill which will be introduced in the Legislature in the near future, whereby it will be necessary for all operators to be licensed, and an age limit of 16 years will be set.

The Jefferson Amusement Company is completing preliminary arrangements and plans for the building of a model moving picture theater at 29th and Dauphin streets. This new enterprise should prove much of a success in this neighborhood, which is one of the liveliest spots in this section of the city.

The Ideal Amusement Company has purchased for a nominal consideration the motion picture theater at 1963-69 Columbia avenue, which was formerly owned by William Cohen. The house is subject to a mortgage of $39,042.56. The property is assessed at $18,000.

The American Cinema Film Company, of Philadelphia, was recently incorporated under the laws of Delaware, with a capital of $50,000. F. R. Hansell being the principal incorporator.

Plans and specifications are being prepared for a one-story moving picture theater to be erected at Kensington and Lehigh avenues for John Knoll. As soon as the plans have been completed bids will be taken and the contract awarded, so as to get the project under way as soon as possible.

On March 24 the Chelsea Moving Picture Theater, 2719 Atlantic avenue, Atlantic City, N. J., will reopen for the coming season. The theater will be under the management of Dumoff Brothers and Rabowitz.

Another popular picture theater of Atlantic City, N. J., which will open in the near future is the Sea Shell. The management is now preparing plans for the coming season and have decided that the opening show will be on Decoration Day. Several special features are being contemplated.

The Felt Amusement Company has awarded the contract and has been granted a permit for the erection of a moving picture theater at the northwest corner of Fifty-second and Locust streets at a cost of $22,000.

Many regrets have been expressed among the local moving picture proprietors over the death of Herman H. Hess, a prominent theatre owner and athlete. Mr. Hess was thirty-four years old, and is survived by a widow and a daughter. He was prominent in Masonic circles, and was a member of the Quaker City Baseball Club, the Stetson Club and the Turgemeinde.

Plans and specifications are now being prepared for a picture theater, to be erected at Sharpnack street and Germantown avenue, for Benjamin Hass. Structure to be of brick and terra cotta, 42 by 100 feet, and one-story high. CONGDON.

PITTSBURGH.

ANOTHER new theater is to be built in the Northside. S. L. Banks, manager of the Park building, is having plans drawn by Thomas H. Scott for a theater to be built in West North avenue, adjoining the Masonic property. The building will be 90 by 150 feet and will cost about $30,000. There will be two store-rooms fronting on North avenue, with an entrance to the theater between them. The auditorium will seat 1,000. Bids are being taken, and it is expected to have the theater ready for occupancy early in the summer. The plans call for fireproof construction, and the North avenue front is to be made artistic by the use of glazed terra cotta.

W. C. Coyle, manager of the C. & J. Film Company, of Pittsburgh, has returned from a trip to Mexico. Mr. Coyle gives a gloomy outlook of the situation down in that belligerent country.

Fresh impetus has been given to the activities of the public safety department against immoral and objectionable moving pictures that the police and reformers evidently think make up the program of the local exhibitors. Civil Aid Archibald Mackrell, local censor of films, has been assured of the hearty co-operation of representatives of all the Protestant churches in the city. Dr. William R. Farmer, professor of the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian church, and the chairman of the committee on amusements of the Christian Social Service Union of Pittsburgh, pledged his assistance to Mr. Mackrell in behalf of himself and the churches. He said the Social Service Union is to make an appeal to councils for the creation of a moving picture censorship committee, but that meanwhile it will co-operate with Mr. Mackrell in the exciting and entertaining amusement known as "Hunting the Immoral Film."

The new theater at Federal and Isabella streets, Northside, is receiving the finishing touches, and the contractors are endeavoring to have it completed within next month. The house, when finished, will be one of the handsomest theaters in Pittsburgh devoted to motion pictures alone. The house will seat 800 and will be equipped with the latest in modern improvements. The exterior is constructed of stone and tile. The house is owned by R. H. Boggs, who has leased it to the Harris Amusement Company. The theater will have cost $60,000 when it has been completed.

Richard A. Rowland and James D. Clark, owners and operators of a string of motion picture houses in Pittsburgh, have rejected the bids made by local contractors for the erection of a theater at Whitfield and Kirkwood streets, Pittsburgh. The architect's designs call for a one-story, brick, granite and terra cotta building, 62 by 109 feet, and to seat about 1,000. The plans will be revised for the purpose of decreasing the cost.

Coulter & Tope, of Center avenue, Burgettstown, Pa., are going to sell the present equipment of their motion picture house, and install new machinery.

W. E. Einstein has leased the new motion picture theater that was erected in Corry, Pa., by Thomas W. Keating. The theater is part of a large office building, the entire structure costing $7,500.

A magnificent theater has been opened in Beaver Falls, Pa., by John L. Paff. The building in which the theater is located is also equipped with space for apartments, stores and offices. The building cost approximately $75,000. The theater is built of brick, stone and ornamental terra cotta. It is 76 by 100 feet and seats 1,500.

In order to lower the cost of the theater L. L. Banks, superintendent and agent of the Park building, Pittsburgh, will have the plans for the proposed motion picture theater on West North avenue, Northside, Pittsburgh, revised and refigured. Mr. Banks is contemplating placing $35,000 in the investment.

The theater erected in Beechview avenue, Pittsburgh, by Elmer H. Johnston, has been leased to Samuel Gensberg, of this city, who will operate it. The theater is of fireproof construction, one story in height, and is 30 by 85 feet. It cost $8,000.

Nicholas Lambros is the owner of the new theater in Leechburg, Pa., which will be completed soon. The theater is part of a building which also contains apartments, and cost $20,000. Mr. Lambros will operate the theater.

The theater at 528 East Ohio street, Pittsburgh, Pa., has had alterations and additions made to the building, thereby increasing the seating capacity and bringing the house up to date. D. L. Clark, the confectionery manufacturer, is the owner and the theater is leased and operated by the McKeesport Amusement Company.

George H. Hobson, owner of the new motion picture theater that is being completed at 1532-34 Beechview avenue, Pittsburgh, will probably operate the theater. The house is 40 by 85 feet, is of brick fireproof construction and is costing about $9,000. MANLEY.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

THE Universal Company has a miniature theater in its new exchange, where exhibitors may view any film before booking it. The demonstration is in charge of H. W. Talbot, assistant manager of the exchange.

The Mutual Corporation has recently put on five new people in the last two months, and even at that they can't keep up with the rush. Mr. Fred A. Keller says the Mutual Girl is winning the hearts of the audiences and dollars for exhibitors.

Manager Schwartz, of the St. Charles and the Broadway Theaters, runs six two-reel specials a week, in addition to the regular program of the two houses, using General Film Service.

Wm. Sievers, of the New Grand Central, who believes in the eternal fitness of things to the extent that he will pore over a dozen musical catalogues till he finds an appropriate song or piece of music to fit a production, made a very happy choice when he selected "Laddie" to be sung immediately after the last reel of "The Good Little Devil," a Famous Players' production. The words and the spirit of the song is all in keeping with the atmosphere of the play that hal gone before.

The Hippodrome ran "The Merchant of Venice," a four-part Universal feature, for three days, and in response to many requests from teachers and others interested in classical subjects it was given a return date on a Saturday, in order to make it possible for school children to attend.

The Gem Theater which was advertised for public sale a few weeks ago, has been bought by Frank Talbot, the original owner and operator. The Gem is where Mr. Talbot began the theatrical activities that has had such a wonderful influence in building up South Sixth street property. The Gem is being refurnished and refinished throughout at a cost of about eight thousand dollars, and when complete will be operated as an exclusive picture house.

J. Noeker has assumed charge of the Warner's Features office in the Benoist building.

Edward Stevison, of the Grand Central on Sixth street, is kept busy answering telephone calls from folks who want to know when and how often they can see Selig's "Adventures of Kathlyn" pictures that his house is running.

The Republic, one of the largest dailies in St. Louis, gave a large amount of space, and a regular dramatic criticism to Mary Pickford in "The Good Little Devil," a Famous Players' production, while the film was being shown at the New Grand Central.

George E. Bailey, manager of the Bijou Dream Theater, 606 Washington avenue, was on the ground at the great Missouri Athletic Club fire with his camera almost as soon as the fire department reached there, and secured the only night pictures of the disaster. Mr. Bailey stationed himself just across the street from the burning building on the Fourth street side, and although the heat was terrific, and the position one of great danger, he stuck to his guns and succeeded in getting 175 feet of realistic pictures showing the fire in all its horror, and the falling walls and floors that carried thirty persons to their death, and injured fifteen or twenty more.

The Citizens' Committee of the Business Men's League is making use of moving pictures in its campaign to secure signers to its initiative petition for the completion of the Free Bridge. It is showing pictures of that long delayed, half-finished structure on the screens of St. Louis theaters.

Manager J. G. Conner, of the World Feature Corporation, reports that he will soon close a contract that will put moving pictures in one of the large downtown theaters, an old line house that has heretofore never even considered a picture program. The plan is for the booking of "The Triumph of an Emperor" for an indefinite run, at which prices ranging from twenty-five to fifty cents will be charged.

The Shenandoah Theater, devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville, announces a reduction in prices as follows: balcony, ten cents; first floor, twenty cents; and all boxes, thirty-five. Nothing reserved except boxes.

The American Theater Curtain and Supply Company is now completely installed in its new quarters in the Nolsen building.

The St. Louis Times is conducting a Favorite Player contest. A coupon is printed in each issue of the paper and it can be used as a vote by those who want to see the portrait of their favorite actor in the paper. The picture of the player receiving the largest number of votes appears in the Times every Tuesday. Alice Joyce, King Baggot, Kathlyn Williams, Maurice Costello, Mary Fuller, John Bunny and Broncho Billy are crowded up near the top of the lists of ballots.

W. J. Flynn has been in Chicago on business for the Grand Avenue Amusement Company, of which he is the general manager. With the addition of the Park Theater, on Delmar Boulevard and Hamilton avenue, which was opened in the middle of January, Mr. Flynn is the active head of one of the largest strings of moving picture and vaudeville houses in the city. In addition to the Park, the company controls the Princess, the Shenandoah, and the Juniata, on Grand avenue; the Arco, at 4207 Manchester avenue, the Union Theater and Airdome, on Union and Easton avenues, the St. Charles and the Broadway, which are both situated in the heart of the downtown shopping district, on St. Charles street. Three of the theaters, the Juniata and two St. Charles street houses, use an exclusive picture program, the others intersperse vaudeville with the films. All of the theaters of this circuit are high class in every respect; the buildings are all new and of the latest design, and a very high standard of individual as well as general management is maintained. In fact the precedent set by these houses plays no small part in the maintenance of the level of artistic excellence that St. Louis occupies in the amusement world. Mr. Flynn, who gives his personal supervision to every house in the circuit, has a general office in the International Life Building, at Eighth and Chestnut streets.

The new Grand Central booked "Joan of Arc," a World Film Corporation picture, for four days, beginning with March 22.

E. W. Dustin, who is establishing the Eclectic Film Company's Exchange, has secured a building at 3210 Locust street, which is admirably suited for his purpose. The location is central, the floor space is generous, and the offices are being furnished in a manner befitting the strength and dignity of the corporation.

The World Film Corporation has moved from the Brown's Business College Building to its new and commodious quarters in the fifth floor of the Navarre building. The company occupies suites 501, 507, and 508.

In the middle of the busiest block in the downtown shopping district the Bijou Dream Theater, 606 Washington avenue, depends on pictures alone for the entertainment of its patrons. The Bijou Dream, operated by the Irving Amusement Company, runs four reels of Universal pictures, and no music. It opens at 9:30 in the morning, and closes at 10 o'clock at night, and is always crowded.

H. H. Young, formerly, with the World Film Corporation, is now with Warner's Features.

When the Old Grand Central at Sixth and Market streets ran Kalem's "Colleen Bawn," a little box of Irish soil furnished by the Kalem people was placed just under the box office window, and while many of the hundreds that trod in the little box did it just for the novelty of the thing, there were many loyal sons of Erin whose steps on the real "Ould Soil" was more of a caress than anything else.

Beach, one of the owners, is second vice-president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of California. The price of admission to this house will be 10 cents, except when features are shown when 20 cents will be charged. Mr. Beach states that the attendance is heaviest when the higher prices prevail.

BILLY BISON.

MONTREAL.

OWING to the dates left open by the curtailment of the Quinlan Opera Company's engagement, the film "Atlantis" was put on for fifteen performances at His Majesty's Theater, Guy street. The first performance, March 20, saw a full house, and crowds beseiging the box office. Mr. Sinn, of the Quebec Censors, says that it is the finest film he has ever seen.

"Count Zarka" and "Acquitted" will be shown in Montreal. Justice Charbonneau having refused an interlocutory injunction against those who proposed to present them. The Great Northern Film Company applied for the injunction against the Consolidated Film Company. Harry Pulce and others, in an attempt to prevent them showing these films. They asserted that defendants acquired the films through an agent who had no authority to allow them to be shown outside of Europe. Respondents answered that they had secured the films in good faith through the ordinary course of business. Another film, "Atlantis," was also in danger of being held up pending the above decision.

Pathe's "The Black Countess" was recently shown at the Casino. The management take special pride in their daylight pictures. These they claim to be the only ones in Montreal.

Justice Archibald, on March 19, began the hearing of a suit at the instance of J. O. Bastien against the city of Montreal. Plaintiff is the proprietor of a moving picture theater at 482 Montana street. On April 24, 1911, he alleges, the city passed a by-law, No. 432, imposing a tax of $500 on each proprietor or tenant of a picture theater. In December of the following year, the Quebec Legisalture imposed a tax of $200 on such proprietors. Plaintiff paid this tax and got his license. He pleads that the city by-law is now null and void, inasmuch as the Quebec Legislature by its enactment of December, 1912, took again into its own hands the powers that had been previously delegated to the city, and that the city's powers of taxation on the picture theaters were thus abrogated. Furthermore, he claims that the city law is vexatious and unjust, in that while he was asked to pay $500, there are others who are only paying $50 or $100 of a tax. He asks the courts to declare the city by-law imposing the tax null and void.

Several Montreal houses had special features in honor of St. Patrick's Day. The New Grand showed pictures of the local Irish parade; the Imperial had "The Colleen Bawn" and Irish soil in its lobby; and one St. Lawrence Boulevard theater had its lights shaded green and dressed its doorkeeper in a Paddy-green uniform.

Lovers of Shakespeare were favorably impressed with the film version of "The Merchant of Venice," a Universal production at the Strand.

The cameraman at the New Grand is proving to be very popular. He is daily kept busy taking pictures of events in and around Montreal. He secured several good scenes of the local St. Patrick's Day parade. The management has renewed the ladies' souvenir matinees.

The New London Theater, formerly the Gaiety, is very pleasing to the eye now that it has been enlarged and remodeled. "The Master Crook" was recently shown, and Universal films are quite in evidence. A feature of the new house is the arrangement of the boxes. There are two of these, each seating about twenty. They are placed at the very back of the theater, and furnish a splendid view of the screens.

Auxiliary Exchanges In Buffalo and Boston

We are establishing exchanges in Boston for the convenience of New England exhibitors and in Buffalo for the upper part of New York State. We are proceeding as rapidly as good judgment permits, but—

In the meantime a great many ambitious, well-meaning exhibitors in New York City and State, Northern New Jersey and New England, are wasting valuable time struggling with doubt and suspicion. As a matter of fact any one of them can shut his eyes, put his finger on any feature listed above and secure a high class money-drawing attraction.

KALEM.

CAPTURED BY MEXICANS (Special—2 parts—April 8).—While crossing the Yuma Desert on their New York-to-San Francisco journey, the Ridgeleys rescue Pete, a Mexican, just as he is about to die of thirst. The man later shows his ingratitude and is driven from the camp. The Mexican returns. Stealing Don's rifle and horse, he shoots and seriously wounds his benefactor. Before making his escape, Pete empties the water bottles. Fearing lest she and Don perish of thirst, Cleo mounts her horse and accompanied by Major, her collie, goes in search of water.

While she is gone, Pete returns to the camp with a band of Mexican rebels. The latter carry Don away with them as prisoner. Later, the rebels get into a battle with a body of Mexican Federals and are defeated. Pete and Don are captured. To save himself, the Mexican declares that Don is the leader of the rebel band.

Overcome by heat and thirst, Cleo topples off her horse. Major tries to revive his mistress. Failing, he bounds away. He attracts the attention of some prospectors. Their curiosity aroused, the men follow the dog and find Cleo. The girl is revived and tells her story. Later, she learns of Don's capture by the Federals. The prospectors accompany her across the border to the Mexican town. Calling upon Ford, the American Consul, they enlist his aid.

General Ordez, the Mexican commandant, condemns Pete and Don to death. The men are led out for execution. Ford, Cleo and the prospectors arrive before General Ordez and convince him that Don was a captive of the rebels. The officer makes out a pardon and gives it to Cleo. The party hastens to where Don faces the firing squad and arrive just as the soldiers are about to shoot. The American is freed. Pete, however, meets the fate he deserves.

GERTIE GETS THE CASH (April 10).—Matilda Grimkins tells her niece, Gertie, an actress, that she will present her with $10,000 on the day she marries. Gertie decides to get the money without acquiring a husband.

Gertie leaves the house, after requesting her aunt to entertain Charlie, her sweetheart, should he arrive.

Shortly afterward Matilda opens the door to "Charlie," Gertie in disguise. The "boy" makes violent love to the ancient lady and wins her heart.

Matilda simpers over her new-found love, but later is terror-stricken when Gertie returns. The girl discovers that her aunt has stolen her "sweetheart." She threatens to commit suicide. Matilda offers Gertie the $10,000 to assuage her grief, but the actress, proceeding to the next room, fires the pistol. Terrified Aunt Matilda drops the money and flees.

HUBBY'S NIGHT OFF. (April 10).—Helen, invited to a bridge party, tells Jim that she intends to visit her mother and cautions him not to leave the house. Jim has been asked to sit in on a poker game and seizes the opportunity to indulge in his favorite pastime.

While the newlyweds are out, a burglar ransacks the house. Jim returns just as the thief is about to depart. The latter raps Jim on the head. Thinking it was Helen, hubby takes to his heels. Great is his terror when he sees his wife coming from the opposite direction.

Helen enters and sees the disordered condition of the house. Jim is about to confess, when Helen drops the prize she won at bridge. Mutual confessions follow. Securing a pack of cards, Jim and Helen sit on the edge of the bed and have a friendly little game.

UNDER DESPERATION'S SPUR (April 11).—As the result of Jack's carelessness, Molly, his sweetheart, is blinded. According to the doctor who is summoned, the girl has but a slight chance to recover her sight. Jack brutally informs Molly their engagement is at an end. A blind wife is too great a handicap, he declares. Redding, a revenue officer who poses as a coal land operator, meets the girl and falls in love with her. Shortly afterward, the doctor calls again and to his amazement discovers that Molly is practically certain of recovering the use of her eyes. Placing a fresh bandage about her head, he cautions Molly to exercise extreme care in keeping all light from her eyes. Exposure to daylight means blindness for life, he declares.

Redding follows Jack and discovers the still conducted by the latter. Jack comes upon the revenue officer trying to enter the place and with the aid of Tom and Billy, confederates, captures him. Redding makes his escape and dashes for Molly's home. Jack follows the revenue officer. The moonshiner enters the house. Pointing his rifle at his quarry's heart, he compels Redding to return to the still. While Molly's brother goes for help, Molly, seizing her rifle, gropes her way after the moonshiner and his captive. She succeeds in entering the still. Redding, Billy and Tom, their attention centered upon their captive, do not see the girl until Molly, snatching the bandage from her eyes, covers them with her rifle. The sheriff and his posse arrive just as Molly loses her sight. Jack and his confederates are placed under arrest and led away. Will, heartbroken over his sweetheart's terrible sacrifice, takes her in his arms and promises to guide her through life.

THE WILES OF A SIREN (Special—2 parts—April 13).—Hughson, a wealthy cynic, resolves to start life anew in the country. He meets Millie Parker, the daughter of a country parson. A month later, the cynic and the simple country maid are married. Upon his return to the city, Hughson finds that his wife cares nothing for fashionable society, preferring to spend her time aiding the city's unfortunates. While in the slums, Millie meets Rosa, one of the submerged.

Broughton, Hughson's friend, is also interested in charity work. As the result, he and Millie become firm friends. Cora Grayson, an adventuress, loves Hughson. She implants the germ of suspicion in his heart and causes him to think Millie guilty of an intrigue with Broughton. Millie discovers that Broughton is searching for his wayward sister. Later, she learns that Rosa is the missing sister, and brings the girl back to Broughton's arms. Hughson, ignorant of this, finally orders Millie to return to her father. His faith in womankind shattered, the man goes back to Cora and resumes his old life.

Hughson learns of his terrible mistake, however, when Broughton and Rosa come to express their gratitude. Hastening to the country, Hughson finds that Millie, heart-broken, has gone to Africa to take up missionary work. The husband immediately follows. A tribe of natives go on the warpath and attack the little party of workers in the mission. A friendly native gives the alarm. He meets Hughson, who is with a party of hunters. The white men go to the rescue. The missioners are about to be burned alive, when Hughson and his party arrive. A hot battle ensues and the blacks are beaten. Hughson finds his wife. Clasping her in his arms, he begs Millie for forgiveness.

BIOGRAPH.

THE DOCTOR'S TRUST (Mar. 30).—Intrusted with a fund from the Charity Association, the doctor was called away on a consultation. Returning, he read that the money had been stolen by an unknown burglar. The father suspected his son, not without reason, but subsequent events proved true manhood still remained.

THE BURGLAR'S SACRIFICE (April 2).—While memories of little feet that played no more filled the childless home, the lone woman, her babe in arms, trod the snow. There in the deserted shack the burglar came upon the babe. Through his sacrifice, it found a home.

SKELLEY'S BIRTHDAY (April 4).—At her late Saturday marketing, Mrs. Skelley suddenly remembered it was Skelley's birthday. A bargain in eggs, she decided to make a cake. The eggs were back numbers, but Mrs. Skelley declared the bargain the best in the market. The party was on. That was Skelley's cue to get rid of Mary's fond lover, the ribbon counter clerk. He certainly made a mess of him—and Mary Skelley decided that a fireman husband was better than a ribbon clerk.

BILL TELL, PAWNBROKER (April 4).—The Tell brothers kept the local pawnshop. This was how Bill became known as a sure-shot archer. Bill's cousin left his bow at the shop and Bill used to go out hunting in the king's grounds. One day he shot at a king's rooster pecking cockel bugs on the hedge. It hit the queen munching whiffle berries in the garden. Now Tell had driven an arrow straight into the fleeting form of the king's income tax collector. This assault on the queen was the last straw. The king went to see about it—told Tell if he didn't shoot an apple off his brother's head, he'd get his where the rooster did. Trust the Tell brothers. That day they lived as knights.

EDISON.

CLARENCE AND PERCY'S SAILING PARTY (April 6).—Clarence and Percy did not really mean to be sailors. Percy spent most of his time allowing his chauffeur to drive a high-power motor car and Clarence was a young man whose sole ideas in life was to look pretty in order to make a hit with the fair sex. However, when they found that Bessie Pendleton was passionately fond of the water, which fact enabled a certain George Graham to see a good deal of her, it became evident to their young minds that something had to be done. They did not play the game quite fairly, because they first went to Bessie's grandmother and told her that George was really not a fit associate for her granddaughter. Then they proceeded to hire the only sailboat in town. This raft would hardly be selected to sail for a challenge cup, because her rig was decidedly primitive and a long oar took the place of a rudder. But to their excited imagination she was quite a trim little ship. To the owner's rather dubious inquiry as to their ability to sail, they replied to the effect that they had been brought up on the briny deep. So they arranged themselves fearfully and wonderfully in sailor togs—because one must do this sort of thing properly, you know, and the party, with Bessie and her grandmother, started merrily off. But somehow the boat didn't act as she was expected to. Notwithstanding the fact that they used nautical expressions that were beyond criticism—at first—the boat either stood stock still or pursued a devious course that was somewhat terrifying. Finally, she "jibed" and George, who up to this time had been watching the operation with amusement, made a hurried dash in his motor-boat to the rescue of the struggling party in the water. All were safely taken aboard with the exception of Clarence and Percy who, astride of the upset sailboat, were towed ashore. They then and there passed a unanimous resolution that they would have to forego the further pleasure of Bessie's company and that motor cars were infinitely preferable to sail boats.

ANDY AND THE HYPNOTIST (Fifth of the Andy Series—April 8).—Professor Mysterio, the noted hypnotist, disagrees with his assistants to such an extent that they all quit in the middle of a rehearsal. No assistants mean no performance and consequently no money. The professor and his manager start in search for new ones. They enter the telegraph office where Andy is employed and decide Andy would make a good subject. After satisfactory terms have been made, both with Andy and his employer, Andy consents to take the job.

At the hall, during a matinee performance, Andy is hypnotized and told he is "Sitting Bull," the Indian chief. Andy immediately follows in the footsteps of that noted warrior and starts to massacre the pale faces. All would have gone well, had not a Children's Society agent interfered and arrested Mysterio, which left Andy free to wreck vengeance upon the unsuspecting public, which he does, first by a fight to the death with a cigar store Indian, which he mistakes for the foe of another nation. He next discovers four girls coasting down a hill on a sleigh and kidnaps them for squaws, making them do all the work squaws should be made to do, build snow houses, carry wood, supply provisions, etc., also do a war dance for the entertainment of their Lord and Master, Big Chief Andy. The neighbors crowd around but dare not interfere. Finally his chum, Lanky, takes his courage in both hands and enters. Andy pounces upon him, tomahawk in hand, but recognizes his old friend and they agree to smoke the pipe of peace. Not liking the taste of the pipe, Andy swaps one of his squaws with Lanky for a cigarette. In the meantime Mysterio learns of Andy's plight and comes to the rescue, but after Andy's mother gets there he decides to be "Sitting Bull" no longer, as he is obliged to eat his meals from the mantel.

THE IMPERSONATOR (Special—3 parts—April 10).—To have been brought up in the orphanage; to have never known luxury, yet always to have craved it. That was the situation of Mary Lang, whose one particular asset was beauty, when she walked into the studio of May Hadding, an American girl, studying in Paris. May had cravings, too. They were chiefly divided between a certain Gus Schulze and the desire to paint. But a letter received that day from a rich aunt in America, whom she had never seen, inviting her to come to America on the strength of a photograph she had sent, purporting to be of herself, but which, in reality, was Mary Lang, caused her no little uneasiness. The sight of Mary prompted a confession and proposal from May that she go across the ocean in her stead, and carry out the deception that May had started. Mary's anger over the unpermitted use of her photograph was quickly dispelled by the opportunity to roll in the lap of luxury, and so, three weeks later, when Mary walked into Mrs. Whiting's drawing room in Washington, and saw the frank look of approval on her supposed aunt's face, she felt absolutely secure in her position. She was an impostor and he believed in beauty won her many admirers. Especially did the quiet manly dignity of Congressman Hyland appeal to her. And when she saw that he loved her, she realized for the first time how impossible was her position. She was an impostor and he believed in her. What happened next so surprised Mary that she could hardly realize that it was true. It happened at the house of Count Portucarrero, a foreign ambassador, where she discovered, hanging in his library, a portrait of her mother. She implored the count to tell her if he knew anything of her father, but he assured her that he did not. But Mary instinctively felt that he could tell her much, had he desired. Mary now begins to receive letters from May, threatening her with exposure unless she remits some of the money that she, May, supposes she is getting from her aunt. Added to this, Leonard Bishop, an American whom she had known in Paris turns up and confronts Mary and tells her that unless she introduces him to her set, he will denounce her.

Affairs are quickly reaching a climax when May Haddins puts in an appearance and says she has come to denounce Mary, and claim her own rights, but Mary forestalls her, and in a scene of remarkable dramatic power, Mary denounces herself. Mrs. Whiting is amazed, but on catching sight of the real niece, who is as ugly as she is selfish, she orders them both to leave her house. Mary is taken in by a certain Mrs. Jerome at the request of Count Portucarrero, who is on his deathbed. He eventually sends for Mary, discloses the fact that she is his daughter, and a countess and an heiress in her own right. No longer an impostor, Mary proceeds to remember those who have tried to forget her, and at last she is free to go to him who loved her even in her degradation. The atmosphere of social and political life in Washington is faithfully carried out, and the picture marks another step forward in Edison photoplays.

THE CHINESE FAN (Fifth of the "Dolly of the Dailies" Series—April 11).—All newspaperdom was excited over the strange disappearance of Muriel Armstrong and each daily was doing its best to discover the missing heiress first, and thus secure for themselves one of the most sensational bits of news of the day, but no trace of her could be found, despite all efforts. The editor of the Comet ground his cigar and swore impotently and even Dolly, the star reporter, was at a loss for clues. Dolly was pondering over the matter on her way to her evening's assignment; the Chinese theater in Mott street, where she was detailed to report the play. During the second act a little Chinese pin in the shape of a fan, which Dolly was wearing, unconscious of its significance to the Tongs, started a riot in the theater.

As Dolly was escaping down the side street a huge hand protruded itself from a small door, pulled her inside, down a narrow corridor and thrust her into an ill-lighted den. How could she get out? She pounded on the door and called for assistance but all that greeted her was a chuckle and a slushing of soft footsteps down the corridor. She peered around in the gloom and suddenly a frightened bundle of humanity detached itself from the corner and a young girl fell at Dolly's feet, imploring assistant. Dolly raised her gently, looked into her face and discovered that she was Muriel Armstrong, the missing heiress. All fear of the Chinese vanished. Here was the scoop of the year. Fate helped her too, for the half-crazed opium fiend who was Muriel's guard, upset the lamp and set the place on fire. This enabled Dolly and her prize to escape and the next morning the heiress was turned over to her delighted parents.

THE BLACK MASK (First of "The Man Who Disappeared" Series—April 7).—John Perriton was unmistakably a good fellow. He was never one to spoil a party with a long face and an absence of joviality, nor was he at all likely to break up any sort of festivity by leaving early. A few people shook their heads gravely, and said that he was hitting the pace entirely too hard and that he would certainly kill himself if he didn't cut down on his liquor, but most of the world accepted him cordially on his own estimation as a man's man. Perriton loved Mary Wales almost as much as he loved himself, which is to say that he was not ready to settle down yet for her sake. Mary's brother, Nelson, was a weak, helpless individual, who was always in hot water. On the night of the masked ball, he came to Perriton, and asked him for help in one or two matters. He needed money very badly. To make matters worse, he had forged his sister's name to a check. The long and the short of the whole business was that Nelson must have $75,000 by the next morning. Perriton wrote an order on his bankers for $50,000, the entire extent of his depleted fortune, and drove Nelson to the station. But Nelson was not satisfied. He had to have the other $25,000. So he slipped off the train, came home by a short cut, put on his dancing mask and attempted to take his sister's jewels from her safe. He was surprised by the butler, and in the desperation of fear, killed the man. Immediately afterwards, Perriton arrived. Nelson, almost frenzied, begged him to put on the mask, and to pretend to be the criminal. No one would know who he was, and he would see that he got safely away. Perriton assented. His identity was discovered by Mary who, agonized at her discovery of the apparent character of the man she loved, forbade him even to think of her again, and allowed him to escape. Despite everything, Perriton kept silent, and allowing the woman he loved to think him the meanest type of criminal, went off into the night.

ESSANAY.

THE PRICE OF HIS HONOR (April 7).—Vincent Calvert, an author of fame, is engaged to marry Alice Montague. In spite of his greatness, he is not a MAN, instead he is weak and shallow. Like a coward he placed a note in her room, telling her he could not marry her—that he was wedded to his work. She suffered and her mother consoled her through the dark days that followed. Calvert finally marries his private secretary, and her position is filled by a man. While the husband worked, the secretary and Calvert's wife became very friendly, so friendly in fact, that Calvert's former sweetheart overheard them planning to elope. The girl was undecided what to do—should she tell the former sweetheart of his wife's faithlessness? Well, she fought it all out with herself. Then she decided to save his happiness and show the light of right to the young wife. And it was a sacrifice too.

THE BARGAIN HUNTERS (April 8).—This is a pleasing story of a young married couple, who are the victims of a boarding house. They decide to move—to keep house for themselves, and a week later we find them in a cozy flat in the suburbs. Mrs. Hunter has an irresistible desire to purchase everything for the apartment at a "bargain," and many humorous incidents occur on this account. The climax comes when she finally purchases an oil stove, which not only smokes up the whole apartment, but finally explodes. The decide that although boarding costs more, it is cheaper in the end, especially when the home is run by an inexperienced housekeeper.

SNAKEVILLE'S NEW SHERIFF (April 9).—Reno Bill, a notorious bandit, has Snake County in fear of him. Bill notices reward signs posted round the town and becomes so peeved that he finally makes the town board dance to the tune of his six-shooter. The position of sheriff becomes vacated, and Slippery Slim, being out of a job and at the same time, on the outs with Sophie, his beloved wife, is forced by his better-half to accept the office of sheriff. He tries to console himself with a jug of liquor, but before he can place it to his lips, Reno Bill takes it away from him. Reno then loses himself in the enjoyment of the little jug and falls asleep. Slippery Slim then takes him prisoner—leads him back to town and lodges him in jail—and the would-be sheriff is hailed as a hero—and rewarded.

THE TREACHERY OF BRONCHO BILLY'S PAL (April 11).—Broncho Billy and his pal, Carl Stockdale, are in love with Peggy Adams. The two men receive a letter from the girl to the effect that the one who reaches her first shall be her husband. Broncho and Carl cut cards to see who will go, and the former wins. On the way, Broncho Billy is shot by a half-breed who has a grudge against him. Broncho Billy immediately comes to the conclusion that Stockdale shot him, and at first is temped to seek revenge, but decides otherwise. Broncho Billy sacrifices his love for his pal and wends his way to other parts, leaving the field clear for Stockdale.

IN THE MOON'S RAY (Special 2 parts—April 10).—Meredith Blake, a gentleman crook, learns that Mr. Hamilton has recently obtained a priceless scarab. He makes up his mind to get it. At the same time, Spider, an accomplice, or accident finds an invitation to the reception at which the scarab will be shown. This clears the way for Blake's entrance to the Hamilton home. Accordingly on the night of the reception, he goes. The butler, not recognizing him, tells his master. Mr. Hamilton, and Blake is confronted. He adroitly allays suspicion by telling them that he is from headquarters. When the scarab is exhibited, he slips away from the crowd and, finding himself in Mr. Hamilton's bedroom, secrets himself in a clothes closet. Meanwhile, Spider waits outside in the taxicab to help him make his getaway. True to his reasoning, Blake sees through the clothes closet door that Mr. Hamilton keeps the scarab in his bedroom. When all is quiet, he slips out in the moonlight that comes in through the window and takes the scarab from the escritoire. Mr. Hamilton awakes. Outside Spider, who has come to the window of the bedroom, sees all this and entering, hits Hamilton. It appears that he has killed him. At the same moment, Judith enters the room, having heard the noise. She swoons, and Blake, infatuated with her, makes Spider carry her out with them. Part one ends with Judith being taken away and Mr. Hamil-

In part two, Judith is seen in the taxicab. She comes to herself, notices the auto license number and also that she still holds tightly clasped in her hand her fountain pen, which she took with her when disturbed in writing. She throws from the cab her slipper on which she has written for help. This hits Richard Neal, a private investigator of crime and whom Mr. Hamilton phones just as Neal enters his library. He immediately forms a connection between the two incidents. At Mr. Hamilton's home, he finds several clues, one in the form of a heel print of peculiar marking. After hearing the whole recital of what happened, he immediately decides upon a plan of action. The next morning finds him busy. He fully explains his plan to Mr. Hamilton. He leaves and goes to the place where he has found out that the taxicab, which he has traced, will be. Here he conclusively proves that the driver is the maker of the damning heel print. At his home, he obtains a confession from the driver, Spider, by a clever ruse. After this they, Neal and Mr. Hamilton, force Spider to take them to the den. Here a terrific struggle takes place, in which Mr. Neal and Mr. Hamilton are victorious. The scarab is returned to Mr. Hamilton, Judith is rescued and all the crooks pay the penalty of crime. The ending of the story suggests that a love story will be the continuation of what nearly made a tragedy.

VITAGRAPH.

CHERRY (April 6).—A convivial evening at Hoag's Tavern is interrupted by a young companion, William Fentise, declaring to the assembled company that he is very much in love with Sylvia, known as "Cherry", the beautiful daughter of Mr. Gray, a wealthy resident of their town. He conspires with some of the bolder spirits of the company to hold up the stage in which Mr. Gray and his daughter are homeward bound to the King George Inn, he will then dash up, drive the "robbers" away single-handed and claim the fair lady. O'Donnell, a rough-and-ready spirit, agrees to lead the desperate band. In an upper room of the Tavern, Mr. Sudgeberry, a staid and studious gentleman, who is also a suitor for the hand of the fair Sylvia, overhears the plot. He is not naturally of a courageous nature, but the thought of Sylvia urges him out into the deep snow. He hides under a clump of bushes near the point of attack and witnesses the whole affair. The attack takes place as arranged, and in the midst of it, the valiant William comes dashing into the band on horseback, and with his wonderful "sword-play", beating down all opposition, soon has the robbers in full flight. After their departure, Sylvia and Mr. Gray express their heartfelt gratitude and the party then proceeds to their destination, accompanied by the brave William. Hoag, landlord of the Tavern, and one of the band has been behind. Sudgeberry, picking up a cutlass, forces him to come with him to King George's Inn and there, confronting Mr. Gray, Sylvia and William, makes him confess the whole affair was a farce, deliberately planned by William. That gentleman sorrowfully admits the truth and Sudgeberry steps forward, feeling sure that the girl will denounce the young man's perfidy and place her faith and trust in him. Sylvia confronts William and says, "If you have done all this for me, then you must love me!" She stands close to him and William is not too surprised to take her lovingly in his arms and seal their betrothal with a kiss, while the landlord gives a whoop of satisfaction and Sylvia's father laughs at Sudgeberry's chagrin.

THE MEMORIES THAT HAUNT (Special 2 parts—April 4).—Deeply absorbed in his work, James Moran, the author, though affectionate and considerate, will not allow his beautiful wife, Isobel, to interfere with his hours of work. Loving life and pleasure, she cannot understand him. Moran goes to another city to confer with his publishers, and while he is away, Isobel puts into execution a plan she has long contemplated. She writes to her husband that though she admires him, she loves life, pleasure and sunshine and is going home. When Moran receives this letter, he hastens home and with face white and tense with despair, enters the house, which he finds deserted. Unable to stand the loneliness of the place, he sails for a foreign country. Out at sea, the steamer is wrecked and hundreds lose their lives. Moran helps the women and children into the lifeboats and just as the steamer is going down, jumps into the sea and gains a piece of wreckage to which he clings.

Washed ashore on a light-house isle, Moran finds new friends in the light-house keeper and his wife and their little grandchild. He feels keenly his failure to have made his wife happy, and tortured by memories, he writes his great work, in solitude, called, "The Memories That Haunt". The work is published as the work of an unknown author and scores a tremendous success. It is commented on as very like the work of Moran, though deeper. Isobel, reading it, feels that only her husband could have written the book, then laughs at the idea, and finally, drawn by the memories that haunt, visits the lighthouse island. Here, posing as a tourist, she induces the keeper and his wife to let her see the writer's room. She can find no clue to the writer's identity. Moran returns to his friends on the island and is told in jest that "There is one of them tourists up there now." Amused, he goes up to take a peep at her, only to come face to face with his wife. Complete understanding and reconciliation follows.

'FRAID CAT (April 8).—Like many other little boys, Sonny Jim hates the dark. At bedtime his mother tucks him in his crib, surrounded by Chap, his dog, and a Teddy Bear. After she has put out the light and gone down stairs, his eyes get big and round with fright. Finally he creeps to the stairs and calls down, "Say Daddy Jim, it's awful dark up here!" Daddy puts him back in bed, telling him very gravely not to be a "'fraid cat." Daddy's business is not going well. He must raise money immediately, and meeting Old Skinflint Pennyworth, desperately requests a loan. Old Skinflint finally agrees. Daddy Jim gives Old Skinflint his 30-day note for $5,000.00. A month later, the note falls due. Daddy has not the money to meet it and begs Skinflint for an extension of time, but receives a flat refusal. Sonny overhears Daddy angrily telling mother that "The Old Skinflint would break me, if he could!" That night, Daddy and mother go to a nearby party. Sonny in bed, awakens and finding himself alone in the dark, is badly scared. He tells Chap, "Perhaps the Old Skinflint has broken my Daddy all to pieces!" Sonny, steals outdoors, determined to go to Old Skinflint's house and accuse him of the crime. Daddy comes to see if Sonny is all right. Unable to find the boy, he is greatly worried, and rushes back with the news. Sonny, although terribly frightened at the awful darkness, finally reaches Old Skinflint's house. After much hammering and ringing, he is admitted. Old Skinflint is astonished and saddened when Sonny accuses him of "Breaking his Papa." He calls up Sonny's parents and tells them where the boy is. Daddy Jim arrives and finds Sonny asleep in old Skinflint's arms. The old fellow is smoothing the boy's hair, his face wonderfully softened. Sonny awakes and tells Daddy "I ain't a 'fraid cat anymore, and he didn't break you, did he Daddy?" Old Skinflint flushes and as Daddy is leaving with Sonny, the old man, whose heart has been touched, slips the canceled note into the boy's hand. Daddy thanks him and goes out with Sonny. Old Skinflint, with a wistful smile sits holding his arm as though Sonny were still there and tenderly stroking the child's head.

THE LITTLE SHERIFF (April 9).—Sheriff Bill, a widower, and other residents of Lonetown, a small Western community, decide they need a school teacher for the children. They send for one, and Mary Turner, a good-looking young schoolmarm arrives. Buddy, the Sheriff's little son, has a great fondness for guns, and is forever getting hold of his father's heavy-calibred rifle and marching around with it. His father solemnly warns him the next time he touches it, he will get spanked. The Sheriff is greatly taken with the new school teacher, as is also Carter, a gambler and shady character of the town, who tries to force his attentions upon her. She repulses him and Bill protects her. Carter loses heavily at gambling and holds up the stage. He is recognized when his mask becomes loosened and is obliged to take to the hills. Sheriff Bill and a posse start out after him and Buddy is greatly excited. He cannot resist watching them from the schoolroom window and causes Mary so much annoyance she sends him home. Despite his father's warning, Buddy gets the big gun from the wall, and starts off "man-hunting." Carter, in the meantime, has doubled back on his trail and enters the school buildings. He goes up to Mary and seizes her arm. She screams and Sonny, going by, hears it. He goes in and orders the desperado to throw up his hands. Seeing the boy means business, Carter obeys. Mary calls for help and the posse returning to town, having lost the trail, rush inside and capture the villain. Buddy, notwithstanding his brave action, gets his spanking just the same, he disgustedly decides to run away. Meeting Mary, he tells her, "Heroes aren't appreciated around here. I'm going away and then they'll all be sorry." She is talking soothingly to him when Sheriff Bill comes up, repentent for being so harsh with the boy. Buddy is prevailed upon to forgive his father and they shake hands. Mary kisses Buddy, and to her embarrassment, he suggests she kiss Papa, too. The Sheriff and Mary look at each other, and as they all turn homeward, he puts an arm around Mary's waist, and we all feel sure Buddy will have a lovely stepmother.

THE MYSTERY OF HIDDEN HOUSE (Special—2 parts—April 10).—While tramping the hills of Virginia, Dick Marston, a young minister, sprains his ankle. Moina Jardine, a demure little mountain maiden, assists him to her grandfather's home, "The Hidden House." Old Jardine takes a liking to him and persuades him to finish his vacation with them. Marston learns that Moina is subject to great stress of mind, at times. She tells him she and her sister, Robina, take turns caring for Mr. Jardine. Marston falls in love with the beautiful Moina, but Mr. Jardine and Mercy, the colored servant, show dislike for her, the grandfather saying, "Wait until you see Robina!" One day, Moina turns from Marston and begs her grandfather to explain the mystery, but is angrily told to keep silent. That night Marston, walking in the grounds, meets Moina. She seems dazed, tells him not to follow her—that Robina comes! She disappears, leaving him greatly puzzled. The next morning, Robina, beautiful and bewitching, comes dancing in and is welcomed with great joy by the grandfather and Mercy.

Mr. Jardine and Mercy decorate the house and at night the colored servant tells tales of witchery by firelight. Marsten, in his room, sees Robina dancing through the grounds in the moonlight. She throws a stone at Marston's window and laughingly coaxes him to come down. He refuses. She pouts and goes straight up to his room, laughing at his displeasure. Seeing a picture of Moina, she angrily tears it to pieces and rushes out. Marston is fascinated by Robina and one day, seizing her in his arms, he kisses her passionately. Suddenly her expression changes. She cries out that Moina is coming and falls unconscious. The girl is cared for by Jardine and Mercy and when Marston next sees her, finds she is once more the sweet and gentle Moina. Apalled at the strange phenomenon, he is overcome with emotion. The grandfather explains that Moina is a dual personality, possessed in turn with the soul of Moina and that of Robina, which explains why Marston has never seen the two girls together at the same time, but he knows that Moina and Robina are one and the same. Marston later meets Moina in the garden and tenderly takes her in his arms, telling her of his love. The mystery of "Hidden House" is solved.

MELIES.

BATTY BILL'S HOME ROUGH-HOUSED (Mar. 28).—Batty Bill has some bachelor apartments. He also has a friend, who has fallen in love. These lovers adjourn to Batty Bill's apartments, where unfortunately for Batty Bill, they are traced by the wrathful father, who spites his wrath on the furniture and contents. While doing this, he is discovered by Batty Bill, who, in his humble endeavors to stop the damage, becomes himself the object of the father's fury and is chased through all sorts of ridiculous mix-ups; from roof to roof and through shops alike.

HANDSOME HARRY'S WOOING (Mar. 26).—Handsome Harry endeavors to obtain the hand of a dear little girl, who is herself very much in love with a boy of her own age. The parents favor Handsome Harry and do all they can to bring about the love match, but to no purpose. The girl and the young lover win over the affections of the mother to their side, and the young lover becomes a footman to the family.

When dinner is served, the mother pretends to have a fit and becomes hysterical. Nothing brings her together until several things have been smashed, wherein the footman does full justice to the smashing business. Handsome Harry questions as to the cause of the lady's conduct, and is persuaded that she inherits a family disease, and the daughter is likely to suffer in the same way. This scares Handsome Harry, who bribes the servant to let him out of the house as quickly as possible.

THE RIVAL COLLECTORS (April 4).—Ronald Simpkins loves May Brunell. The fathers of both the lovers are enthusiastic stamp collectors. While their paths do not cross all goes well, but one evening they almost at the same moment spy a rare specimen at a dealer's. Both cannot secure it, and Simpkins' father is the successful bidder. Brunell is greatly annoyed at losing the stamp and a royal row results.

This would not be a great harship but for the fact that the defeated collector is employed by the same firm as young Simpkins and he carries the disagreement into the young man's love affairs. Unless peace is made between them there will be little hope of marrying May. The cause of the troubl is small: the results promise to be fraught with much unhappiness.

Where before he was a careful worker, the difficulty in which he finds himself preys upon Ronald's mind: and although he has not been infected by the collecting craze, he neglects his work through thinking of the stamp his sweetheart's father would so dearly love to possess. One day he makes a succession of blunders, and is severely reprimanded by his employer, who is unable to understand why the young fellow is so remiss. He learns the reason and in order to help him, writes to his foreign correspondent for a stamp of the same issue.

A month later the stamp arrives. The envelope falls to the ground and is picked up by Brunell, who fondly hopes that the prize may be his. But the employer demands it back and hands it to Simpkins. Naturally this did not improve the relations between them. Ronald, however, knew what he was about, and that evening wrote to his sweetheart's father, enclosing the coveted stamp, and expressed the wish that he and his father might visit Brunell, as there was no wish to maintain the differences between them. Brunell consented to the visit and the quarrel was made up, to the gratification of the lovers.

BATTY BILL'S LOVE AFFAIR (April 4).—Batty Bill marries a girl, who, having no proper clothes for a day in the country, dresses up in her mistress' new clothes. While seriously engaged in the business of love-making at Batty Bill's so-called apartments, her hat caught fire. Batty Bill so confused with thoughts of love, tried to put it out by fanning it with the towel. Realizing that his poor girl was in great danger, he picked her up and plunged her headlong into the bathtub, ramming down the lid as tight as he could, to make sure that she was properly soaked. Just at this moment they are disturbed by the man bringing in coal, and again in his imbecile manner Batty hides his girl in the coal shed, where the coals are heaped upon her head without any respect of person.

It is too funny to describe what follows this, but we need hardly say that poor Batty's feeling are considerable cooled off after his day's experience.

CARBY'S NIGHTMARE (April 6).—This is a screamingly funny comedy, where the cabby, tired and worn out, goes home and goes to bed. During the night we see him slumbering in his bed with his wife, when the nightmare takes place. Then we get a realistic picture of the horse walking into the bedroom, kicking the driver out of bed and forcing him to take the shafts of the cab, while the horse takes the seat. The poor cabby is made to change places with the horse.

This is one series of continuous laughter, as the tricks he goes through are very remarkable. The whole thing ends with the poor cabby falling out of the bed and receiving a proper scolding from his wife.

BOBBY "SOME" SPIRITUALIST (April 6).—Bobby's parents are confirmed spiritualists, and Bobby, disobedient as ever, decides to play a practical joke on them, tieing thread to all the vases and other parts of furniture.

Bobby allows the servant to put him to bed. When he is supposed to be sound asleep, Bobby gets up, and while the spiritualistic seance is taking place, Bobby begins to pull the tables and vases over unto the heads of his parents, who are scared and think this is the work of the spirits, until the servant discovers Bobby in his nightshirt busy with the spooks, or in other words, the thread.

ALL IN THE AIR (April 7).—Three tramps, Tom, Dick and Joe, find some crates beside the railroad track containing the equipment of an acrobatic team, which has accidentally fallen from a show train. They are starving and conceive the idea of utilizing the outfit to give a show. They discover some professional photographs in the trunk which illustrate the acts and they proceed to practice the tricks. Not being very clever, they bluff it through. Dick is sent in clown's dress to advertise the show. The news quickly spreads and the whole countryside turn out to see the show. Tom and Dick do an acrobatic act with tables, introducing funny falls, etc. Dick supported by a wire does some truly wonderful hand balancing feats which amaze the country people. The collection nets them more money than they have seen in the last year. They decide to give an enchore and while Joe is working away at the ropes, one of the rubes, curious to see "behind the scenes," wanders back to the tree where the fake is being worked. He calls the others to come and see, and the tramps make a break before the audience perceive the deception. The farmers give chase and catch them, but instead of beating them up they merely want to congratulate them; and one old whiskered fellow gives an additional half dollar.

THE BULLY'S DOOM (April 7).—Pearl Dugan, the pride of Pig Alley, is loved by and loves Mugsy Sullivan.

Pug Hogan, a big bully, also likes Pearl, but she dislikes him on account of his brutal nature. Every time Hogan finds Mugsy with Pearl he proceeds to beat him up. Pearl gets disgusted with Mugsy because he does not attempt to protect himself, and she tells him not to talk to her again until he has thrashed the bully. Mugsy is about to give up all hope of winning Pearl, when he happens to pass a street faker's stand and is struck with an idea. He proceeds to test it and purchases a few bottles of the faker's "Sneeze Powder." Mugsy starts for Pearl's home and revenge. He finds Hogan waiting for Pearl and while the bully's back is turned Mugsy blows the powder in his eyes and nostrils and while he is sneezing Mugsy proceeds to thrash him. Unable to defend himself, Hogan is obliged to take the beating, thereby losing his reputation as a bad man, as well as allowing Mugsy to win back his sweetheart.

LORD ALGY (2 parts—April 8).—Lord Algy, a young Englishman, is a golf fiend. But when an American player defeats him he induces his uncle, Sir Lionel, to send him to the States that he may become more proficient. His lordship and his valet, Pat, come to America. Society gets hold of Algy and he is dragged to this affair and that. Though all the mothers throw their daughters at his lordship, he falls for none of them; he is here to golf, until he meets Lottie, a golf enthusiast, and they spend enjoyable days on the links.

Lottie's father is a big contractor. He considers Algy a boob, because he does not understand his type. Algy receives word from London that his uncle, Sir Lionel, has died, leaving him penniless, through unfortunate investments and Algy is upset as to his future. Pat has enough money to take them home, but Algy decides to remain in America and to "go into trade." Pat refuses to desert his master, so the two secure a room in a tenement. Pat gets a job as a laborer while Algy secures a position in a store. He mixes things up so that he is obliged to tweek the nose of his peppery little boss who attempts to humiliate him. Then, of course, he resigns. Through Pat he gets a job driving a cart where Pat is employed. Through it all his lordship observes the formalities of his class—dressing every night for dinner, which Pat cooks on the oilstove. Algy is delegated by some fellow laborers to go for a bucket of beer. One day on his way he bumps into a couple of men who have been hired by a rival contractor to explode a bomb under the building. Algy, knowing that should the bomb explode it would make a nasty mess, goes to remove it. The men try to stop him, but he fights them off and grabs the bomb. After deliberate thought, during which the fuse burns down close to the exploding point, Algy tosses it into the air, but a little too late. They take him to the hospital. A few days later there comes a cable from Sir Lionel demanding the cause of Algy working as a laborer. Also another cable from the club members advising him that they had sent him a false alarm of his uncle's demise. On top of all this good news comes Lottie's father, for whom Algy had been working without the knowledge of either. When father hears all facts he changes his mind about "the dude." Then pretty soon Lottie comes around and everything ends happily.

THE ROOT OF EVIL (2 parts—April 9).—Patricia Jordan loves Leonard Craig, who is poor and who for that reason does not propose. Patricia's family have been on the ragged edge for years. Her mother and younger brother, Cyril, rebel against their poverty and continually remind Patricia that the wealthy middle aged Judge March needs only a little encouragement to ask Patricia to be his wife. Patricia thinks that married to the judge, she can aid her family and can give her brother an education. The judge proposes and Patricia later becomes his wife. Leonard is sent by his firm to South America and arranges with Hazel Welsh, daughter of the judge's cashier, to look after his mother. While the young wife is fairly happy her hopes are not realized. The judge sees no reason for allowing her an income when he supports her well. Patricia's family is not benefited, and Cyril has plunged into debt. Joel Martin, money lender of the town, encourages the boy in his helplessness, and when the first I. O. U. becomes due Cyril goes to his sister for money. Patricia pays his bills and when Cyril's demands become greater she turns to the stock market rather than have Martin go to the judge. She loses money and finds herself at a crisis. Cyril has quarreled with Martin and the brokers have wired Patricia for immediate remittance. The gardener, Hazel's father, is also in the power of the money lender and when Hazel and the latter meet, he openly encourages the attentions of the sinister old man. Patricia writes to Leonard, who has arrived on his first visit home, appealing for aid. The gardener delivers the note. Leonard responds, lends her money and warns her to stop speculating. The gardener runs to his cottage and finds Hazel struggling in the arms of the money lender. The money lender is shot by Welsh. Welsh gains possession of the note sent by Patricia to Leonard. Suspicion points to Cyril as the murderer. He is arrested. His sister is astounded, but when Leonard, who as he left the house, saw the murder, tells her the truth her only thought is to clear her brother. Leonard confronts Welsh and threatens to have him arrested. Welsh defies him and in turn threatens to expose Leonard and the judge's wife. As the day of the trial approaches he fears arrest and takes a daring chance. He mails the note to the judge, knowing that at all costs the judge will shield his wife. The judge is shocked, but Patricia tells Leonard to tell the truth at all costs. Leonard tells the judge everything and when Patricia enters, instead of casting her off, the judge declares he believes in her. Welsh is arrested. Leonard realizes that Hazel is no longer a child and that he loves her, but Hazel will not give him an answer while the cloud hangs over them. The police enter to take her into custody. She faints in Leonard's arms. In his cell Welsh is found dead next morning. Hazel tells the truth and Cyril is freed.

ON THE BRINK (April 10).—Tom Harris and his wife, Laura, have just lost a baby daughter. She is weary of life and nags Tom until it ends in a quarrel. At this juncture some of Tom's cowboys come to the house to make him a present of a handsome new sombrero. They bring with them, to make the presentation speech, Karl Reed, a young Eastern lawyer, who has opened practice in the nearby village. Karl has met and admired Laura, the woman being flattered by his interest, and she tells Karl how tired she is of the life on the ranch.

The next day, Tom's brother, Bob, comes into the house, hangs his hat on a peg and sits down to dinner. Tom is trying to placate the still offended Laura, but the wife slips out from under his arm and goes to the bedroom. Tom unconsciously takes Bob's hat and goes out to the ranch. Bob finds his hat missing. In his great hurry, he seizes Tom's new sombrero and rushes for the village. Karl, in his office, sees Tom's new sombrero passing his street window, the face of the wearer not being visible. Karl jumps to the conclusion that Tom is in town, and seizes the opportunity to go to talk with Laura. At the hotel Laura is fearful that Tom is around, but Karl assures her that he is in town. As they sit with there backs to the window, Karl urging Laura to go east with him, Tom appears passing one of the windows. He halts, unseen, and hears Karl's proposition. Tom's first impulse is to kill the man, then he controls himself and returns his revolver to the holster. Laura finally agrees to go away with Karl. Meanwhile Tom climbs in the window. He lays his revolver on the table and on top of it places a newspaper. Then he harries to the bedroom, takes a tissue paper-wrapped package from the dresser drawer and dumps it into an empty suitcase on the floor. Tom then hides again. The wife goes to the bedroom and starts to pack the suitcase. She finds the package and unwrapping it reveals a pair of baby shoes. Returning to the main room, she starts to write a farewell note. Her eyes fall on the newspaper. There is a story of a woman who tried to shoot herself, a woman who had left her husband to run away with another man. She lifts the newspaper, and there is the revolver underneath. It brings her to herself and terrified, she calls for Tom. The husband hurries in and Laura throws herself into his arms.

AT HIS EXPENSE (April 11).—Joe Thorne is wha is known to the world as a worthless, dissolute husband, but with all of his idleness and shiftlessness he has a kindly and liberal disposition. At the opening of the story we find him hopelessly broke, his home belongings nearly all sold, and his family of a wife and five children suffering from an almost utter lack of food. When he appears one day, a little the worse for liquor, her patience now taxed to the utmost limit, his wife declares that she will have nothing further to do with him, orders him from the house, and he wanders forth.

But this time fortune turns, for he meets an old acquaintance named Goodfriend, who, true to his name, offers him a position in his office, to replace a clerk who has proved himself unworthy. Goodfriend tells him that his attire is not in condition to make himself presentable to the clients of the office, and consequently furnishes him with an order on a large department store, to "furnish Mr. Thorne with whatever he needs." Joe's needs being many, and his sense of humor keen, he orders from the store the many things needed, not only by himself, but his family, the total amounting to an almost even $500. So now we see the Thorne family in a house fully furnished and each member properly dressed. When Goodfriend receives his account from the department store, his anger is boundless, and, of course, poor Joe is fired. Afraid to go home and report his last misadventure, he wanders the streets, and finally decides to return to the office for a final effort at moving his friend to pity. But Goodfriend has gone to his club, and he finds the office in charge of the discharged clerk, who has a letter, apparently from Goodfriend, restoring him to his former position. Knowing the clerk's career in the office, he telephones for Goodfriend at his club, finds that the letter is a forgery, and while Goodfriend is on his way back to the city, sets himself to watch the office. Thinking himself alone, the clerk proceeds to rifle the desk, and enters the safe for the purpose of robbing that, when Joe appears from his place of hiding and shuts the safe door. On his return, Goodfriend, finding the culprit gone, says that he would give $500 in cash to get hold of him. Joe immediately produces the offender, is given the $500 in cash, repays Goodfriend for the bill at the department store, and is, of course, restored to his position.

Brass Frames and Rails

when we first introduced brass frames for theatres, it was a difficult matter for us to convince the exhibitor of the importance of making an artistic lobby display—they didn't think it necessary to spend money for brass frames as long as they could plaster their posters on the wall or where they had a few inches of space. These exhibitors were not aware that they actually drove away thousands of people who would like to have spent an hour's time in enjoyment. They would stop, ready to deliver the price of admission, take one look at the unsightly entrance and walk away.

But time has changed—now most exhibitors realize their lobby is their biggest asset—they know that by making their lobby inviting to the public, by using bright brass frames neatly arranged in the lobby actually leads the way to the box office. We have hundreds upon hundreds of testimonials to this effect. ARE YOU ONE OF THESE WISE ONES?—if not—YOU ARE ONE OF THOSE HELPLESS EXHIBITORS WHO WATCH THE PEOPLE PASS BY AND DROP IN ACROSS THE WAY. You are the ones we can benefit — get in touch with us at once—any of our brass frames from our $3.00 style up will show a wonderful improvement from the very day they decorate your lobby.

TIVOLI AND ITS CASCADES (Italy)—(Mar. 31).—The opening scene shows the ancient temple of Sibyl. It was at this ancient temple that the Romans went to consult the oracle before taking any important step. And the oracle would tell them, it is said, whether they would succeed or fail in the prospective undertaking.

From the terrace of the temple can be seen the City of Rome as it is today. A beautiful sight. The camera next turns its eye on the Villa of Esta, containing a number of wonderful gardens that date back to the 16th century. Decorative fountains are everywhere in the gardens murmuring a melancholy melody which can be heard distinctly, so quiet are the surroundings. Too, the severe beauty of the vegetation makes this solitude even more impressive.

Farther along on this delightful journey the camera stops before the celebrated Tivoli cascades which flow into an abyss 360 feet deep.

A VISIT TO THE VOLCANO OF KILAUEA (Hawaii) (March 31).—The Hawaiian Islands are notorious for their many volcanoes. The greatest of these is the Volcano of Kilauea and to the crater of this boiling mountain a journey is undertaken. It offers a rare opportunity to the adventurous individual to satisfy his lust for unusual surroundings and strange visitings.

WHIFFLES PICKS A PARTNER (April 1).—To secure a legacy, Whiffles is informed that he must marry at once. He is pleased at the prospect, but absolutely helpless, as he has always avoided the companionship of the fair sex and now that he must seek it he knows not where to turn. An advertisement catches his eye. "Marry at once!" commands the ad. "Enroll at the Happywed Matrimonial Agency." Whiffles does so, and although he is a source of amusement to the male applicant at the agency, one female spouse seeker finds that the backward Whiffles measures up to her ideal in every way.

Her name is Martha Marvin. She is as coy as Whiffles is bashful. She tells Whiffles she likes him, and more than that, she asks him to call. The next day, at the appointed time, Whiffles is ushered into Martha's home and lovingly welcomed by her. But Mr. Marvin's reception is of a different order. "Take the boob away," he orders. Martha pleads, but a glance from the old gent is sufficient for Whiffles. Exit the lover.

Mr. Marvin, however, regrets his treatment of Whiffles the very next day when he learns that the bashful bachelor is wealthy, for money matters are rather strained with Mr. Marvin. He so informs his daughter. Martha communicates the information to Whiffles and with hope high in his heart and a firm resolve to be avenged, Whiffles renews the quest for the heart and hand of Martha. How different now is the reception accorded him by Mr. Marvin! But the sting of Marvin's previous insult is still rankling in Whiffles's heart. His treatment of the older man is anything but kind and the father is evidently nurturing an ambition to square accounts later on. But Martha gives her promise to Whiffles, so "He Should Worry."

HIS SWEETHEART'S CHILD (Special—2 parts—April 2).—Ever since childhood, Adrienne and Peter have shared a loyal devotion, that finally kindles an affection on the part of the man to which the girl responds with a tender regard she mistakes for love. Dreams of a happy future attend the fleeting days and old Frantz, the girl's father, adds his approbation. A short time later the day of the wedding is set and Phillip Sargent, an artist of no mean ability, accepts the invitation of his old friend, Peter, to join in the festivities. The simple charm of his friend's fiancee almost immediately enslaves the man, who daily visits the girl's home and has her pose before his brush. Peter lends his admiration to the work and so the moments fly till the day of days at last arrives. Then fate intervenes, for Adrienne has fallen an easy victim before the flattery of the chap from the city, her infatuation finding expression at an opportune moment, while the wedding guests are making merry.

Discovering his bride-to-be in the affectionate embrace of the man he thought his friend, the broken-hearted Peter yields to his despair and resolves to end his life. In this he is prevented by Phillip. Thoroughly convinced of the hopelessness of his love, Peter gives Adrienne to the man of her choice and leaves to be alone in his grief. Five years pass—five long years for Adrienne, who has ceaselessly struggled to retain her faith in her husband. Phillip has early tired of his little wife and spends no pains to hide his disregard. Her misery would be unbearable were it not for the comfort of her child, Rita. There soon comes a time when Adrienne realizes the impossibility of it all. Broken in health and in heart, with her little girl, she seeks the shelter of her father's home. Again she sees Peter, but only for a farewell, for the delicate thread of life refuses to bear the strain of her heart-break.

Fifteen years come and go. The burden of his declining days are cheered for father Frantz by the companionship of Rita, now grown to womanhood. Peter seeks forgetfulness in travel. Phillip, in the meantime, demands his daughter for whom he proposes an education, but Frantz refuses to submit to the sacrifice. Distrusting his strength and ability to cope with the man who has broken the life of his dear one, Frantz summons Peter to defend the girl. Peter again visits the scenes that he would forget. He calls on Frantz and sees Rita. She stands before him, a perfect image of her mother. At once the anguish of what he has lost overwhelms him. He hastens to the grave of his sweetheart of old, and pictures her there with beckoning arms. But the picture is true for it is his sweetheart's child he sees. The old love flames in Peter's heart and the joy so long denied becomes the sweeter for its fulfillment.

IN TANGLED WEBS (Special—2 parts—April 4).—Fraser's extravagant habits at last bring him up sharp before the stern reality of the impossibility of his position. Broken in fortune and with no definite solution of his difficulties, he has sought his friends in vain for financial aid. His creditors persistently dunn the delinquent till finally, in the hope of obtaining some ready cash he resorts to gambling. His luck is spasmodic, but fate plays a trick for just when fortune seems to favor, his winnings are wiped out and he quits the game $3,000 in the hole. Made furious by his loss, Fraser recklessly borrows this amount from a loan shark and promises to pay an extra $3,000 for the use of the money which is to be due on the day of his wedding to an heiress through whose wealth he hopes to be able to square himself.

His fiancee loves Fraser devotedly and little dreams of his motive hidden behind the mask of affection. But Fraser is ill at ease over the game he is playing and hopefully looks forward to the relief his wedding may afford. In the meantime the loan-shark having become tired of waiting for the return of his loan demands its payment within forty-eight hours. At last the day of the wedding arrives, but luck again plays Fraser false. The father of his fiancee is suddenly stricken down and the wedding is postponed. The physicians seem baffled by Richard's malady. Fraser is constantly at the home of the girl, drawn thither by the sordid purpose that prompts his interest in her. During one of his visits he finds Richards' check book, from which he extracts one that he later forges with his name for $6,000. He is thus able to repay the loan shark within the specified time and lives content in the thought that Richards cannot survive. His little God of Chance again intervenes for a new treatment, proves effective and the patient is soon on the mend. The new remedy is so successful the sick man shortly is able to leave his room and attend to some of his pressing business. During his convalescence the discovery that a check is missing arouses his suspicions and as a precaution his bankers are notified.

The condition of Richards has improved to such an extent that arrangements for the wedding are resumed and hope springs afresh in the heart of Fraser while Dorothy is receiving the congratulations of her friends. Fraser learns that his crime is known and leaves the house. At the same time representatives from the bank calling to lay the facts before Richards recognize Fraser, who attempts to escape and start in pursuit. To avoid capture the fugitive seeks refuge in the vestibule of a house, but his capture is imminent and he shoots himself. As his identity is unknown Fraser is taken to the house he was seen to leave and there his victim dramatically accuses him of the crime, but the self-inflicted injury proves mortal and he passes before a sterner justice.

WHIFFLES' NIGHT OUT (April 7).—Whiffles' wife is so much in love with him that she hates to let him out of the house. Therefore when Whiffles' companions had arranged a little game they dropped him a note explaining that they would telegraph him that his aunt was ill and to hurry to her at once. Half an hour later Whiffles is in earnest conversation with his wife when the telegram arrives. The good-natured Mrs. Whiffles urges her hubby to make all speed to his stricken aunt. While helping him prepare, the good woman finds the note from the "bunch" and decides to teach Whiffles a lesson. She writes a note making an appointment for the evening in the garden and signs it "Jules," then after placing the note in a magazine which Whiffles is taking on his "journey," she bids him a fond farewell.

A few blocks away from the house Whiffles discovers the note. He tears his hair, then becomes calm as he evolves a plan. Back to his own garden he goes and lies in ambush awaiting the coming of his rival. One, two, three hours pass, and Whiffles hears voices. With murder in his heart Whiffles seeks them out and finds a lover, but he belongs to the cook. Whiffles waits until dawn while Mrs. Whiffles, highly amused, watches him from her window. Shivering, sneezing and suffering

When he used a Rheostat

Which Would YOU Rather Pay?

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.

Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a

FORT WAYNE COMPENSARC

Now he gets a clearer, whiter, more intense unflickering light and his bills are only about 1/3 what they were before. The machine has three adjustments and the circuit can not break for even an instant in passing from one to another. No delays, no bother, no waste, no danger, no heat.

Send today for our 22 page booklet "Compensare vs. Rheostat." It tells you how you can get much better light at a lower cost.

ANCIENT RUINS AT THEBES (Egypt—April 7).—Here is a peek at a curious corner in the old world. The photography is perfect and the views are interesting to everyone who has read or expects to read the absorbing history of ancient times.

THE GRAFTERS (April 8).—Slippery Snuff Whiskers and Stuffy Rodent, as notorious a team of mice as ever represented that thieving family, set out to live on the fat of the land. In this they are opposed by Detective Thomas Cat, employed by a certain family to detect and punish just such culprits as Slippery and Stuffy. But Detective Cat finds that his task is no easy one, for he is pitted against the two cleverest and most courageous mice not in captivity.

While Thomas is creeping toward Slippery, Stuffy nearly blinds the policeman by dosing him with salt and Thomas retires in defeat. A moment later Cat is back on the job and seeing Stuffy enter a black stocking which was hanging on a line, promptly follows him. Down comes the stocking from the line. At this juncture Dinah, the darkey cook, enters the room. How her stocking can bounce and rear around the floor without her being in it is more than Dinah can fathom and she faints dead away. And so the film goes on, one scene funnier than the other, until the climax, which is certain to be received with well deserved applause.

THE TERMITE, THE INSECT ARCHITECT (April 8).—The Termites in form and habit closely resemble the ant, but their architectural feats are far superior to those of the ant, for the Termite builds a hill 15 to 20 feet high. Every phase of their life and every incident connected with these curious insects is accurately portrayed in the film.

THE GREATER LOVE (Special—2 parts—April 9).—On the way to his ship, which is about to sail on a long voyage, Jack stops at Mary's home and declares his love. The few precious moments remaining are cherished by the lovers till sailing time when the girl accompanies her sweetheart to the dock to bid him a loving bon voyage. After some time of eager expectancy news from the absent reaches the girl, but the further destination of the vessel being undecided Jack is unable to give an advance address. He expresses the hope, however, of being home again in about thirteen months. While Jack is away the girl becomes an orphan through the death of her mother. Her misery is increased by the lack of news from the man she loves. The disconsolate girl closes her house and starts out to seek a living in a distant town. Jack has been unable to send a letter to Mary, but the tedium of the long voyage gives him many moments for thought of the girl he left behind. At last the vessel is homeward bound and the heart-sick sailor writes his sweetheart of the prospect of seeing her soon, but the letter is never delivered, as Mary's address is unknown.

In the course of her journey Mary meets an old friend of her father's, the lighthouse keeper, whose sympathy is excited by the girl's plight. She is taken to live at the lighthouse and a little later, having received no word from her sailor boy, and believing him dead, marries the man who befriended her. Soon after this a shipwreck off the shore startles the occupants of the lighthouse, who aid the sole survivor in his fight for safety. When the exhausted man is brought to shore he is recognized by Mary as her former sweetheart. She nurses him back to strength, but learning of her marriage Jack upbraids her for her faithlessness. The old love for Jack still burns in Mary's heart, but the insurmountable hopelessness of their position drives Jack to the shore, where he broods in despair. He is found thus by Mary's husband, who, having witnessed the scene, reproaches Jack for trying to come between himself and Mary. In the scuffle that follows Jack is thrown from a high cliff, but fortunately is not badly injured. Mary comes to his rescue. She descends by a rope to where Jack is lying and succeds in pulling him up to safety. The lighthouse keeper, in the meantime, hesitates between a fiendish desire to cut the rope by which the two are ascending or alow the rescue to proceed. His better self prevails, however, and the relinquishes his wife to the man she loves.

DETECTIVE KELLY (Special—2 parts—April 11).—Briggs and his wife live lavishly in their magnificent home attended by a retinue of servants, of which home is more favored than Hooks, the butler. Always his master's favorite he conceals beneath the mask of calm servility a propensity for taking things that belong to others. Under cover of darkness, while the members of the household sleep, Hooks succeeds in opening the family safe, from which he extracts a pearl necklace, the pride of his mistress. This he passes to a man accomplice at a window. Secure in the safety that he feels the high regard in which he is held assures, Hooks goes about his duties the next day fearless of detection should the crime be discovered.

But early in the day Brigg's wife has need of the jewel and the loss becomes known. Hoping to regain the necklace or to locate the thief, Briggs seeks the aid of the police and publishes the crime in the newspapers, offering a $5,000 reward for its return. Kelly, who has won distinction in bringing all classes of criminals to justice, learns of the robbery and goes to secure the facts first hand. Arriving at Briggs' home he meets the men from headquarters, who take no pains to conceal their ill-feeling against the "amateur." Even Briggs is influenced by their jealousy, so Kelly receives scant consideration in his quest. Despite all this the detective determines to run down the criminal. The butler is unable to hide his agitation at seeing so notable a figure interested in the case, which action does not escape the eagle eye of Kelly, who immediately centers his investigation on Hooks.

Disguised as a man who had seen better days, Kelly shadows the butler till he sees the accomplice return the necklace to the real thief. He shadows his man to one of his haunts, where a thoughtless movement reveals his identity. His position promises to be an unenviable one for Kelly, who has to contend with the followers of Hooks, who promises to make a speedy end of his chances in the game. A nearby door offers an opportunity for escape and Kelly rushes through, but it leads to a subterranean stream and Kelly is carried out of danger. A few days later the detective, undaunted by his previous experiences, again visits the dive, but this time armed to the teeth. Hooks enters, but does not see the man who is bent on bringing him to justice. At a favorable moment Kelly covers the thief with his gun and clears the room of its inmates. Apparently deceived by the ease of the capture Kelly lays the gun on the table before him and lights a cigarette. Hooks accepts the opportunity for escape and grabs the weapon to fire on his enemy, but it fails to discharge, for Kelly had withdrawn the shells. Utterly subdued by the helplessness of his position the thief himself adjusts the handcuffs to his wrists while Kelly covers him with a second weapon. With his prisoner secure the detective reveals the gun to be a novel fan, with the leaves concealed in the barrel. At this point the two leave the place, but the friends of the butler succeed in getting his prisoner away from Kelly and they escape in an automobile. The detective starts in immediate pursuit, but the handcuffs having been filed from his hands, the thief again makes good his escape. Kelly finally picks up the trail again, but the fugitive jumps on the rear of a passing train. The detective hires an automobile and races the train till finally arriving at a dangerous crossing he proposes to wreck the train by obstructing the track with the auto. To do this he prevails upon the owner to sell it for $2,500 and the plan is carried into effect. The scheme works to perfection for the fast approaching train, unable to check its speed, crashes into the machine and comes to a stop as Kelly triumphantly takes the fugitive into custody.

The result is two poisoned glasses, Janie being interrupted as she is about to drink a sip of the brandy.

Arthur's head is being propped up to allow him to drink the brandy. In the other room Joe is awaiting developments. Carelessly he picks up the glass, into which Janie has poured the poison, fills it and drinks. SCOOPED BY CUPID (April 6).—By profession Mabel is a "Sob Sister," that is, she is a woman newspaper reporter. Kellogg is the star reporter on the Herald, the opposition paper. A tip for an important story is dropped to the Tribune. Mabel is the only one on the job. With misgivings, the city editor lets her learn the inside of a bribe charge against the mayor. Kellogg is covering the same story for the Herald. Kellogg requests an interview, using the name of his paper, and is refused. Mable sends in her personal card. She is received by the mayor and given an exclusive story.

Kellogg, fuming outside the office, hears a stenographer telephone a restaurant for a lunch which is to be brought to the mayor's office. He prevails upon the waiter who brings the lunch to change coats with him. Kellogg enters the mayor's office as the waiter. Mabel's interview, now at an end, the mayor invites her into his automobile. She speeds toward the nearest telegraph office to get her story on the wire.

Kellogg finds a sheet of Mabel's note pad upon which is written enough to give him an idea of the interview. He jumps into a taxi and races toward the telegraph office. On the way he overtakes Mabel. In passing, the taxi crowds the machine occupied by Mabel into the ditch. Mabel is injured, Kellogg writes his story, and hands it to the operator. He has won.

Then he begins to think of the little "Sob Sister" he left in the ditch. He takes his story from the operator, addresses it to the Tribune and signs Mabel's name. He then returns to his office, admits that he has been scooped and quits.

A short time later the city editor of the Herald calls at Mabel's home, where Kellogg happens to be calling, and makes the following declaration:

"You and Cupid scooped the Herald's best man, but we cannot afford to lose him and from now on his salary is raised to family size."

The imaginative little fellow, who has never known the love and kindness for which he craves, dreams a most beautiful dream, in which he goes to the Court of Prince Make Believe to ask the King to restore his health and fortune. The King tells Sonny to find the Spring of Love. The little fellow starts off and comes at last to Taffy Inn to ask about the Spring of Love. He is told Master Fence, the miser, owns the Spring of Love, and he again starts off. After a long and weary search Sonny falls exhausted on the road and is picked up by the miser's pretty little daughter, Pansy. She carries him back to her father's house, where he is placed in bed.

Duke Big-Ears, a villainous servitor at the Court of Prince Make Believe, now enters and demands that Pansy give him food, although his real purpose is to steal the miser's money. Watching his opportunity, he follows the miser to the Spring of Love and shoots him. He then comes to the house and demands a drink of water. The water turns to ink and poisons the villainous duke. Wondering why her father does not return, Pansy and Sonny go forth to seek him and find him lying on the bank of the Spring of Love with his gold clasped in his arm. Saddened at the miser's death, Sonny and Pansy gather all the gold and make their way to the Court of Prince Make Believe. The little fellow has had his health restored by the Spring of Love and his fortune made. He is crowned a Prince and Pansy becomes his Princess. At this moment Sonny wakes up and finds himself gazing into the kindly faces of Mr. and Mrs. Chatterton and little Clara, who has played the part of Pansy throughout his dream.

He also sells morphine to Johnson and various other traffickers of the "dope" throughout the city.

One of Johnson's patrons is an old woman who has spent her last cent for the drug and who is almost insane from the craving. Lucile, the beautiful daughter of Kurson, is greatly loved by James Young, a manly fellow who little suspects the source of his prospective father-in-law's income. Lucile is a patient sufferer of terrible headaches and while Young is calling on her they decide to visit the drug store for a remedy. While there the son of the drug victim enters and Young detects the passing of morphine. Denouncing the druggist,

Some Pan-American Facts

Although capitalized for but $50,000, the Pan-American Film Mfg. Co. is controlling pictures in this country and abroad which foot up a value of over one million dollars, including cost of production and earning capacity.

"No Axes to Grind"

It is not the secret agent of any firm, or group of manufacturers, and does not hold any financial interest in any of the pictures exploited, therefore, all features will be offered on their just merits. Neither inflated values nor panicky sacrifices will prevail.

Successful Booking Methods Applied

The booking methods adopted by Klaw & Erlanger, Sam S. & Lee Shubert, the Northwestern, and all other first-class circuits, and which placed the theatrical business on its sound financial basis, is employed in routing in the first-class, legitimate and high-grade motion picture theatres in all parts of the country.

Big Features on Percentage

Multiple-reel features headed by Stars of National reputation, reproductions of Famous plays and popular books, or events of great International or Historic importance, may be classed as "desirable" in the "legitimate" theatres, and if managed by showmen who know their business, will generally give far greater returns than could be secured upon flat rentals. There is enough open time to keep twenty prints in constant use, provided the subjects are strong enough cards to get the bookings. The Pan-American is equipped to promote strong features upon these lines, and then place them on flat rentals afterward, when this advertising method will secure top rental prices.

Big Profits in Rentals

The last word in payments for feature pictures is from the exhibitor. If the manufacturer or importer secured all this money, it would mean three and four times as great a profit. When the State right buyer comes in between, he pays the lowest price possible, and rents at the top price obtainable. Anyone with enough money can buy a picture, but few know how to exploit on a safe and sane basis. Some overpromise and misrepresent, and the exhibitor loses confidence, and where about $2,500 has been paid in rentals for a feature in a good state by the exhibitors, possibly less than $1,000 has been received by the original owners. The Pan-American Co. is the direct connection between the owner and the exhibitor. The advantages it offers to both are considerable.

State Right Bargains

Some owners must receive quick returns for at least a portion of their product. They are in good financial standing, but need ready money. The curb operators and general dealers are kept in ignorance of these facts. We have the confidence of firms who will listen to an "inside" proposition, if they know it will mean quick business and secrecy, therefore, buyers in any part of the country who can qualify will be placed in touch with special prices and sacrifice sales, and all the details of screen examination, inspection of copyright, review of paper, etc., etc., can be intrusted to the Pan-American staff, by parties who cannot make the trip to New York, and we can get any picture in the market that is for sale and a great many that are not, and after the purchase is made, we are in position to exploit it in all territory which the buyer cannot cover to advantage.

Standing Sponsor

If we endeavor to handle a poor picture, we lose money. If we are reasonably sure of booking any portion of the territory for a buyer who trusts to us, we have to use good judgment in helping in selection of picture or we will also be losers. We are prepared to Guarantee the billing and otherwise assist in the financing of pictures that are worth while. Within the past month, we have contracted to handle less than twenty pictures out of over twice that many inspected.

Salaried Men Not Wanted

It is an open secret, that out of the twenty-two Pan-American offices already established in different parts of the country, not one representative is working upon a salary. They are not in the class of "salaried employees," but have dignified their dealings with us upon a partnership basis. If the heavy weekly expenses of executive offices, repair room, vault, stenographer, shipping clerk, and road men are not covered by the agents' share of the business done, they lose money. These representatives, all of them, are men of experience, and recognize the advantages of connecting with us upon such a basis, and it is an absolute guarantee that pictures intrusted to our manipulation, are going to get all the business possible, and in the quickest order.

Cutting up Territory

Our twenty-two exchanges will soon number thirty-four. This is necessary to supply ALL the feature houses on the lists, and this cannot be done where one firm or agency has too great an area to cover.

Bonded and Guaranteed

Our knowledge of the standing of our various agents, and the splendid references furnished in each case, rendered bonding unnecessary, but is mutually agreed to in every case by the agents to satisfy the skeptical owners of pictures who have had their confidence abused in the past by "irregular" returns. Furthermore, all bookings are reported daily, remittances are immediate, and books open to inspection of our traveling auditors at all times.

Manufacturers Represented

Manufacturers and importers without established headquarters in New York may make reasonable arrangements with us for local representation, and we are ready to cover all departments of the business from the acceptance of the negative to the selling of State rights, or renting direct to the exhibitor, including reviews and advertisements in the trades papers, lithographing, printing, etc. . . . Bonds in any amount furnished. . . .

Pan-American Territory

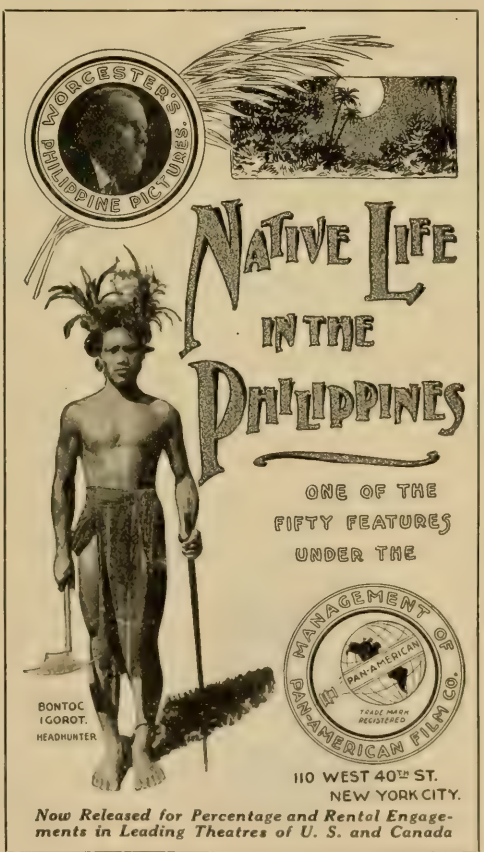
Some of our contracts give us World rights. A great many are for the Western Hemisphere, and others for United States and Canada only. We are arranging for representation in the West Indies, Central and South America, and all United States possessions.

Miniature Theatre

When the night and day demand is too great upon our "Ivy" projecting room, we arrange for use of others in the same building at 110 West 40th Street. Buyers and exhibitors of feature subjects may make arrangements with us at any time for screen examination.

Fifty Features our "Slogan"

Fifty features—each one from three reels in length to a full evening's entertainment—constitute our supply. New ones being released to take the places of those who have covered the territory for first, second, and third runs.



he and Lucile follow the boy to the wretched hovel, where they find the mother struggling in agony on the floor. Lucile picks up a bottle of the Kurson Consumption Cure and idly sniffing it gets her first smell of the intoxicating and fascinating drug. Young visits the police captain. The police are sent to arrest Johnson. Meanwhile the old woman, unable to obtain the morphine, dies. Young and Lucile, filled with pity for the boy, take him home. Meanwhile Johnson, deprived of his business, strikes upon a plan to conceal his morphine powders in an innocent-looking book, the leaves of which are cut out.

Lucile has fallen in her temptation and becomes a confirmed drug victim. She takes it regularly, and her sister at length discovers the terrible truth. One night, unable to withstand her craving for morphine, she arises, and sneaking out makes for John's home to obtain the drug. The little fellow hears her and awaking slips out after his foster sister. He sees her enter the house and secure the drug. Returning home he tells the father what has happened. Young is summoned and securing a policeman, Johnson, the drug peddler, is arrested and brought to the police station. Meanwhile Lucile overcome by the insidious drug, falls in the street, where she is found by a policeman and brought to the same police station. Young snatches her as she falls to the bench and lifting back her veil is heartbroken when he finds it is his sweetheart. A minute later she dies and Young after the first outbreak of grief swears to kill the man at whose door he can lay the crime. Johnson points dramatically to Mr. Kurson, who is entering the door, having been summoned by Young, and tells him, "There is your man." The revolver falls from the bereaved man's nervous hand and he falls across the body of Lucile as they lead the druggist to a cell.

Arriving home, he finds his butler transfixed with terror. Unable to get a rational explanation, he retires to his room and turns down the lights. The door opens; he sees two eyes looking at him from the foot of the bed; he fires, but the eyes remain. Watson turns on the lights, no one is present. The next morning, Watson tells two friends who call, about the ruby. One of them, Prince, determines to get the ruby for himself. An evening later Watson, his sweetheart and Prince go to the cafe. Margaret wears the ruby. During the evening the lights are suddenly turned off; there is a wild scramble. When the lights are turned on, Margaret has disappeared along with the ruby. Watson rushes to his home.

Meantime the orientals get Margaret to their room, but to their astonishment the ruby is not on her breast. Where it lay is a red mark. They then force her to telephone to Watson, asking him to come to her assistance. Watson is trapped. Both prisoners assert they know nothing of the ruby. The orientals then use their occult power, a vision is presented and in it they see one of the friends, Prince, snatching the ruby as the lights turn off in the cafe. The oriental priests visit Prince in his home and after a terrific fight manage to take the stone from him. They then return to their rooms. Watson, in the meantime, manages to phone the police. However, the priests manage to escape with the ruby. Watson and Margaret are set free. The last scene shows a vision of the temple and the ruby being restored.

Every Previous Record for First Run Bookings Have Been Broken by

THE PERILS OF PAULINE

Our Branch Exchanges report the greatest enthusiasm among the exhibitors all over the country. They are ordering more reels for immediate distribution. We placed with each Branch Office more reels of the first episode of THE PERILS OF PAULINE than we ever did of any other feature film, but they have already found that their supply is not sufficient to meet the demand. You will appreciate how the exhibitors are taking hold when we tell you that

More than 400 Advance Bookings on the First Episode Were Booked in New York City and Chicago Alone in Three Days

These bookings included The Keith Circuit, Loew's Broadway and Wm. Fox Circuit, the Proctor Houses, etc.

We have had a great deal of trouble to turn out sufficient finished films. But we can supply all the demand, no matter how great. Most of the exhibitors who have booked orders have seen how great the demand is and, for their own protection, have booked orders for the whole series. We will protect you the same way. But you must get in at once. Give your patrons the whole series, from start to finish. You still can do it.

The Second Episode will be released April 6th. Wire for it, and if you haven't run the first one, get it now.

The Public Have Gone Crazy Over the Mysteries in

The Perils of Pauline

The New York American alone received OVER 20 SACKS of answers in one day. They have special messengers making trips to the post office for the solutions. Their offices are piled to the ceiling with sacks of mail. A special force of clerks had to be put on just to open the letters. The judges had to hire a large force of assistants to help them to read and sort the tremendous number of solutions. One judge said that if he were to attempt to read all the answers himself, it would take him more than six months, reading ten hours every day.

Now, Then, Here Is Where YOU Cash In

What we have told you was at the office of one paper only. There are six others.

The Los Angeles Examiner, The San Francisco Examiner, The Boston American, The Chicago Examiner, The Atlanta American and the Deutsches Journal say that THE PERILS OF PAULINE is, without the least doubt, the most stupendous success, the most widely answered contest, they ever had anything to do with, and that more people are taking an interest in THE PERILS OF PAULINE than they even dreamed of in their most optimistie moods.

Any Exhibitor Who Lets This Chance Pass Him Is Not Alive to His Prospects

There never was anything like it before. People are discussing it in the street, on the cars and the trains, in the hotels and in their homes. Thousands have called on the phone to know if the pictures would give them the answer.

Now, with all this excitement and interest, you can coin money by acting at once. We can take care of everyone who wants an early release. You won't have to wait for several weeks, or even days, for a chance to cash in.

The Second Episode will be released on April 6th

In the first episode you saw the mummy speak. You also saw the race track friend whisper something devilish into Owen's ear. Whatever it was, it had a lasting effect on Owen and made the probability of Harry ever marrying Pauline very remote.

The Perils of Pauline

grow more and more real every installment. In the second episode Owen sneaks into old Mr. Marvin's study and writes something to Pauline to which he signs the dead man's name. Of course it is a forgery, but neither Harry nor Pauline will know—that is one of the mysteries.

What Did Owen Write?

It was something no doubt that would put Pauline completely in his power if she takes the message as coming from the dead adopted father. This is one of the mysteries thousands and thousands of people are trying to answer so as to get part of the $25,000 in Prizes.

As the story progresses, more and more people are becoming interested. Inquiries are coming in from all over as to the names of the theatres where the pictures can be seen. This is where we help you again.

The names and addresses of the theatres showing The Perils of Pauline are printed in the Sunday newspapers.

Every one will know where to go to see them. We are doing everything to send people to the theatres showing The Perils of Pauline. They will get used to going there to see this special feature and you will have made many new patrons who will come regularly to see your programmes on other nights.

Every one of our exchanges reports the most unprecedented demand for bookings and the managers are constantly wiring us for more reels so as to insure every exhibitor an early run.

Freckles finds the pieces of the note and leaves to try to intercept his brother. While crossing the street he is run down by an automobile and taken to the receiving hospital. In the meantime Chuck has a change of heart and decides not to go with the gang, so goes back home, where he finds his mother grief-stricken, because Freckles has been gone so long. Freckles' mother and Chuck are notified of his whereabouts and they are overjoyed on going at once to the hospital, to learn that he is not seriously injured.

AMERICAN.

LIKE FATHER, LIKE SON (2 parts—April 6).—Edward Longley, a bank cashier, and father of a son who gambles, lost heavily and appropriated some of the funds. But a clue betrayed him and he was imprisoned for twenty years.

The twenty years pass, and Edward Longley comes from the prison a different man. He can find no trace of his wife and son. Longley seeks employment in vain, owing to his record, but finally secured a job sweeping the streets. While at work he is struck by an automobile and is taken to the chauffeur's home. When the injured man is brought in the chauffeur's mother recognizes in him her husband. She identifies herself and tells him that their son, Paul, is working in the same bank where the father was once cashier. She asks him not to reveal his identity to the son, lest the knowledge of the father and his guilt may hinder Paul's advancement. The father consents.

Paul secures for Longley a job as nightwatchman in the bank. Naturally as the father was tempted to gamble so was the son. The events of twenty years previous were repeated, but Longley soon discovered the theft and returned to Paul that same night the clue that he had left behind. Then he waited and placed his trust in a higher power. His intention was to surrender himself—not that it did not matter, for it did, but that he could not endure to see his son suffer as he had suffered. His prayer was answered, for Paul returned the money before it was too late. When morning came Longley was gone, but a note left on Paul's desk told him the truth.

A HAPPY COERCION (April 8).—Cynthia, an old maid, has fed old Tompkins bread and honey for fifteen years, hoping he will propose, but so far has been disappointed. She is feeling almost hopeless when he asks her to go to a church social. At the social the announcement is made of the engagement of Mary and John, young sweethearts. Big Bob, a cowboy, wishes them to marry that evening. They escape. Bob grabs the minister, puts him on his horse and a chase ensues. Old Tompkins takes Cynthia home and leaves her weeping with disappointment. The gang, disappointed in not catching the young people when finding the old man on the road home, capture him and returning to Miss Cynthia's house and make the minister marry them.

THE SECOND CLUE (April 10).—Bud Wren and Mabel Garden are sweethearts in the town of Red Dog. Numerous mail robberies occur, but there seems to be no clue to the robber. The chief of the Secret Service wires James Garden, sheriff and postmaster of Red Dog, that he is sending him a man to unravel the mystery of the postoffice thefts.

The Sheriff, Bud Wren and Pratt another cowboy, are engaged in playing cards in Thirsty Fish bar when a stranger enters. He watches the game in a casual manner, when Pratt and Wren, who with the sheriff have been losing heavily, get into a fight over the game. The stranger assists the sheriff to separate them. Wren, rather ugly, goes out, swearing vengeance on Pratt, and goes to the latter's cabin, falls asleep, and waits for Pratt to appear.

Pratt, the sheriff and the stranger meanwhile play cards. The sheriff loses, while Pratt gathering up his winnings in a bag, invites them to a drink. After buying the drink, Pratt leaves for his home. The stranger noticing a medal pinned on the sheriff is informed by him that it was received for being the best shot in the country.

Five hours later old man Simpson, a trapper, sees Wren leaving Pratt's shack. Next morning a cowboy discovers Pratt dead on the floor, and Wren's gun beside him, and informs the sheriff. The stranger sees the sheriff rifling letters. Old man Simpson is talking to the sheriff as the cowboy tells of finding Pratt. Simpson tells of seeing Wren come from the shack. The sheriff calls a posse and they ride off, followed by the stranger. At the shack the sheriff shows all Wren's gun found at Pratt's side.

Mabel, riding up, hears them accuse Wren of the murder and suggest lynching. She rides off to get cowboy friends to stop the lynching. Wren wakes up on the side of the road in a drunken stupor. The party find him there. Meantime the sheriff finds clasped in Pratt's hand a medal, which he immediately recognizes as the one the sheriff had worn. He mounts his horse and rides after the posse. On the way he meets Mabel Garden and the cowboys and together they ride to where the sheriff is about to lynch Wren. The stranger accuses the sheriff and shows the medal as proof and also pulls from his pockets some letters which the sheriff and postmaster has stolen. He shows his secret service badge and the sheriff is taken away. Wren puts his arm around the girl he loves and the picture fades out.

man, and will not have Jack, the young man who visits his daughter.

The miser is deeply interested in Darwin's theory. He is seventy-five years of age. One day Majarah and two attendants in Indian costume enter from the street. The great Lahaif Majarah of India who has come to demonstrate the efficiency of his elixir of eternal youth. The miser looks at him in awe and indicates the book of Darwin's theory. The miser finds out that the East Indian has a great deal of money and valuable skins, and offers his daughter to him for part of this. The East Indian is greatly pleased.

The East Indians give a meeting in the Convention Hall, demonstrating the great Elixir of Eternal Youth. The miser is brought to a chair which is connected with a pulsimeter by means of various tubes and wires. The applicants give the miser the Elixir, and there is a gradual change in the miser. The wrinkles leave his brow, his cheeks fill out, his hair changes color, and he is transformed to a man of forty. When the applicants are not looking the miser seizes the whole bottle of Elixir and drinks it, which immediately changes him from a man into an ape.

The miser escapes from the house, still a monkey, and tries in vain to explain to the people who have gathered, among whom are his daughter and her lover, Jack, that he is the miser and the girl is his daughter. They think his story incredulous, and he is not believed until he shows his arm, which has a tattoo upon it, and shows them a paper which tells about the Hindoo, and his Elixir of Life. They take the ape to the Hindoo and he is restored back to his normal self, the miser. The miser is so very grateful that he is once more in his home and with his daughter that he gives all his money to the young couple.

WHEN SORROW FADES (Mar. 29).—Maud's appeal for newspaper publicity to aid a destitute couple brought the editor, hardened by contact, but softened to grief by love, and when it looked as if Joe were going to force his intended bride to abandon charity work, Jim's abandonment of a coveted auto that he might alleviate distress, won him the girl he felt was beyond his hope forever.

REPENTANCE (Two Parts—Mar. 31).—Two young lawyers, partners in a small city in the East, got along well enough, although it was generally agreed that Hampton, the senior partner, was domineering, while Gray, the junior partner, was regarded as a meek and inoffensive man. One day there was a sensation in the town, for Hampton was found slain in his own home. He was proven at the inquest he had left his office in the late afternoon, his partner and their only clerk being still at work. When the body was found, alarm was promptly given, and a policeman called up the firm to secure details. The clerk and the junior partner were still there, both of whom showed evidence of surprise and grief. The police investigated, but the matter remained a mystery, for it was never satisfactorily cleared up.

Twenty years later Gray, the junior partner, found the Hampton family again crossed his path. Gray's daughter, injured in an accident, might have been killed had it not been for the bravery of a young man who was Hampton's only son. The young couple fell in love, and the father seemed to watch the progress of the courtship with satisfaction. When asked his consent to the marriage he gladly agreed. While announcing it he was stricken and nearly died. He never recovered, and while on his death bed confided to his doctor a document which explained confession of the murder. Hampton it seemed had quarreled with and beaten him, and the tragedy was due to Gray's rage and humiliation. He regretted the deed and for twenty years had been daily a victim of remorse. He believed he might make retribution by giving up the only person he loved—his beautiful daughter. He consented that the doctor should make any use he pleased of the confession.

The doctor considered the matter. The real slayer passed beyond fear of earthly punishment. To besmirch his name would only injure the innocent, but on the other hand, was it advisable to permit a young man to marry the daughter of his father's slayer. Under the circumstances it is an extremely hard thing to decide, and the doctor is still considering what is the best thing to do.

THE RECKONING (Four parts—April 1).—Returning to Havre after a long and prosperous voyage, Captain Pierre Bernier looks forward to rejoining his family in Paris. He reports to his company and is chagrined to receive orders to remain in port for several days. Unable to use the safe of the steamship company, he deposits $10,000, (his share of the profits), with a local bank and places the receipt in a letter which he intends to mail to his wife. Unfortunately, Jaques Villebrun, the president of the bank in which he deposited his money, is about to decamp with the entire funds. Renaud, a clerk, discovers the flight and threatens exposure unless he receives a large share of the money. Villebrun promises him a large sum and they proceed to make their getaway.

Bernier learns that the bank is unsteady, decides to withdraw his money and returns to the bank. He is murdered by Villebrun in a struggle and his body is thrown over a cliff. The clerk has meanwhile found the receipt for $10,000 and keeps it. The two absconders then call a taxicab and prepare to flee. The clerk, however, is sent sprawling by the banker, who safely makes his escape alone.

Fifteen years pass. The captain's widow and son are reduced to dire poverty, while the banker, under another name, has become a wealthy property owner in Paris. Renaud, the clerk, reduced to the lowest dregs of society, is compelled to beg for a living. One day he assists an old woman who has sprained her ankle, and is startled to discover that she is the widow of the man whom he and the banker had robbed years before. She is about to be evicted by her landlord, who, strangely enough, is her husband's murderer. Renaud promises to intercede for her and calls on the landlord. He is surprised to recognize his old accomplice, and proceeds to blackmail him with the receipt which he had carefully guarded all these years. The banker agrees to buy it from him, but plays false again and throws him off a bridge. He is found unconscious and taken to a hospital.

Meanwhile, the widow and her son have been dispossessed and go to live in the rooms of Renaud, who offered to shelter them. Renaud returns from the hospital just in time to rescue the widow after she had been overcome by the fumes of charcoal fire. The banker sneaks into Renaud's garret and searches for the receipt which is hidden there. He discovers it, but is also overcome by the deadly charcoal fumes and is found on the floor unconscious. His conscience is awakened by the distress of those whom he had ruined and he offers a check to the widow to repair, in part, the terrible results of his crime. The vision of the murdered captain appears to the banker and he backs away from its accusing hand only to plunge through an open window to his timely death.

ROSE OF SURREY (The Turner Films, Ltd.—2 Parts).—John Gray and Henry Moore, business partners in a Surrey town and sympathized with each other, for each mourned the death of a wife. Gray was bringing up his only child, Edmund, while Moore had a daughter, named Rose. The two fathers and the children looked forward to their marriage as a matter of course. Rose's father died while she was yet too young to marry, but Moore left, by will, his share in the business to come to Rose and Edmund on their wedding day. Everything ran smoothly until Edmund went to live, for a time, in London, and soon he no longer seemed to care for Rose as of old. Meanwhile Rose, who loved him with her whole heart, waited and waited at home, for she could do nothing. Her shyness and dread of meeting strangers increased till she came to depend solely upon the flowers whose name she bore, for companionship. The crisis, however, came when Mr. Gray invited Rose to his house to discuss with Edmund (whom he had called from London for the purpose) the settling of their wedding day. Edmund refused "to be coerced" into marrying one who did not interest him. Mr. Gray consulted his solicitor, who played the detective, and learned that Edmund was infatuated with a fascinating widow who only considered him as a wealthy catch. But when she knew that to marry Edmund meant taking him penniless she immediately exerted her charms in another direction. This so wounded Edmund's pride, that, acting on his father's advice, he married Rose. Discovering that she really cared for Edmund more than she really thought, the widow attempted to renew the acquaintance. This caused Rose much uneasiness, but with the tactful help of Edmund's father she overcame her fearful shyness and with her husband's love for the stake she played against her rival and won.

A MODERN MEPHISTO; or THE OATH ON THE BIBLE (Six Parts).—Rodgers, a dissolute artist, leaving for Villard Castle, where he is to restore old paintings, tells his friends that he intends marrying Lord Villard's daughter and incidentally her money. Obstacles intervene, but crafty Rodgers succeeds in winning the girl's love. They are married secretly. Alice, the daughter's nurse, learns of the marriage and agrees to keep it a secret so long as Rodgers is faithful. Months pass, and Rodgers tells his wife he will commit suicide if she does not give him $1,000 with which to pay his debts. Lord Villard sees Alice giving her dead mother's jewels to Rodgers. She confesses her relationship and is disowned. Alice goes to Rodgers' home. Finding him with two profligate women, she leaves him in anger. Lord Villard dies, but Alice finds that she must make her own living, as she has been disinherited. Rodgers, financially embarrassed, becomes a counterfeiter. Detected in a theater, Rodgers makes a daring dash for liberty over the housetops, but is captured and sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

Five years later Alice is a famous circus rider. Her little son is being reared in the country by the old nurse. Rodgers, disguised, sees his wife entering the theater. In the course of the performance, Prince Tremayne proposes to Alice, but is told that she is not free to consider his love.

Rodgers startles Alice by appearing at the country place and demanding $500 with which to go to America. Alice, asking time, takes the child to her city home. Rodgers, coming there the next day, snatches up the child and escapes with him when Alice refuses to advance the money. Prince Tremayne follows Rodgers, who uses a motorcycle. In the hot chase the motorcycle catches fire and Rodgers and the boy are thrown to the ground. Using the lad as a shield, Rodgers holds Tremayne and his chauffeur at bay with a revolver. The chauffeur, by swimming a stream, attacks Rodgers from the rear. In the struggle on a bridge Rodgers is thrown into the water thirty feet below. Believing him dead, Tremayne gladdens Alice by this report and by restoring to her the child. Her joy is destroyed a few moments later when Rodgers telephones to say that she needn't feel happy, because he isn't dead yet, and that she still has to reckon with him. Tremayne then suggests that the child be taken to his castle. The old nurse is put on the train with the boy. Rodgers has learned of their plan and is also on the train. The nurse in desperation determines to sacrifice herself. Struggling with Rodgers, she pulls him with her onto the adjoining tracks, where a moment later both are killed by another train. The closing scene is that of Alice now happily married, watching her son putting flowers on the grave of the nurse who had sacrificed her life.

VAMPIRES OF THE NIGHT (Five Parts).—Judith, daughter of a criminal, has been placed by her grandmother, a nurse, in the cradle of Edna, the little Duchess of Burville. The real heiress is brought up as a singing girl at a rough inn, kept by the old evil-faced nurse, Roxana. In the twenty-five years that pass, the false Duchess manifests the strength of heredity, her father's evil tendencies coming to the front. Judith falls in love with Lord Norman, a poet, and in his honor gives a ball at the magnificent Burville Castle. The poet, however, does not reciprocate her affections. Later he hears Edna, the singing girl, on the street. He is startled at the resemblance between Edna and the Duchess of Burville. Enchanted by her singing, he trails Edna to her home and then starts wooing, which is even carried to the point where the poet dons the clothes of a workman in order to be near his sweet singing girl.

Roxana is pressed for money by a confederate, and Roxana in desperation goes to the false Duchess and explains to her the secret of her birth, and demands money as a price of silence. Judith tells her to come later. In the evening the confederate grows more furious in his demands, and not trusting Roxana out of his sight, he insists upon Edna being sent to the castle for the hush money. Edna is received by the false Duchess, who decoys her into a trap door, down which she falls into the city sewers. In Edna's absence, the grandmother and her confederate get into an altercation. There is a fight and the lamp is upset, and the house is set on fire. Lord Norman, seeking Edna, comes in and finds the cafe smothered in smoke. Going upstairs into the flames he encounters a form upon the floor, and thinking it to be Edna, he struggles down the stairs with it. It is Roxana, who, dying, confesses that Edna is the real Duchess, and that she had been sent to the castle. Hurrying away to the castle, Lord Norman demands to see Edna. Judith's actions convinces him that she has been put out of the way. He accuses her of the crime. Under his fiery denunciations, Judith shows him where Edna had been dropped into the sewers underneath the house, and down into their murky depths goes the lover. He finds Edna stunned, but otherwise unhurt by the fall. They make their way to freedom. Meanwhile, in the castle, Judith, overcome by remorse, has ended her wicked life. Edna is restored to her rightful position, there to enjoy the love of he who had loved her as a humble street singer.

THE CRIMINAL PATH (Four Parts).—Jim Jepson returns home after serving five years in prison for bank robbery. He manages to live a straight life with his wife and little daughter until misfortune overtakes him. His wife dies, his daughter is forced to work for her living, and at this crisis in his affairs, he meets one of his former pals, Doc. Burns, a jail bird, who is wanted in the West for another robbery. Jepson, who has become discouraged, is persuaded by Burns to resume his former life. They rent an old house next to a bank, tunnel through the cellar to the bank, working at night, while Mary, innocent of the life her father leads, continues her work as cashier in an all-night restaurant. Mary, returning home late, is saved from insult by Bob Darrell, a detective, who escorts her home. A man seen loitering in the vicinity, is recognized by Darrell, as "The Worm," a notorious crook.

Darrel, who arrested Jepson and Burns twenty years before, follows "The Worm," and seeing him meet Burns, is convinced that there is another plot on foot to rob a bank. Believing Mary to be an accomplice, he causes her discharge so that she will be at home at the time of his raid. Easy access to the house is gained by arresting Mary as she enters the door and Darrell and the detectives descend to the cellar, follow the cracksmen through the tunnel and capture the gang as they are blowing up the bank vaults. Jepson endeavors to exonerate Mary at the trial, but she is given a short sentence while the others receive a long term.

Four years elapse. Mary, released from prison, experiences the utmost difficulty in obtaining the bare necessities of life. Sick and starving, she is tempted to snatch a purse, but is saved from the first step in The Criminal Path as the sound of singing in a nearby Mission reaches her ears. She seeks refuge in the Mission, only to faint away. The young minister, Rev. John Horton, sends her to a hospital where he visits her frequently and on her recovery gets her a position with his sister, Mrs. Blair. Horton's interest in Mary ripens into love, while Richard Blair, the husband, attracted by Mary, annoys her with attentions, but she keeps silent to prevent a family scandal and hold her position.

Unknown to Mary, Jepson escapes from prison and Darrell believes he can recapture him by watching his daughter. Jepson seeks Mary for help in leaving the country. Darrell obtains an invitation to a reception in the Horton home to watch Mary. Blair, finding Mary alone, insults her. To protect herself she seizes a bronze candelabra from the mantel, but is discovered. Mary, for Horton's sake, makes no accusation. Later a noise is heard in the library and Mary is discovered standing over Blair's dead body, but being unable to give satisfactory explanations, she is arrested for the crime. Meanwhile, Darrell, gathering clues, finds Jepson's trail, and convinced that he killed Blair, pursues him across country through ice and snow. Overtaking him, a terrific struggle ensues. Jepson is the victim of his own wicked design to throw Darrell into the ice hole. Notwithstanding, Darrell rescues him. Dying from exhaustion and learning that his daughter is accused of the crime, Jepson gives the true facts of Blair's death, which convinces Darrell that his conclusions were right and that Mary is innocent. At last, the road to happiness opens to Mary.

ZINGO'S WAR IN THE CLOUDS (Three Parts).—Zingo, while working and studying over the prospectus of the Eldorado Mine in his library in Paris, is visited by his faithful crew, who are restless from lying in port and beg of him to put to sea in search of new adventures. Zingo agrees to their proposal, and decides to submit a gigantic scheme to the Eldorado Directorate for working their mine. Arriving in Mexico, he finds the mine operators are entertaining a scheme presented to them by one, Fileas Fogg. Zingo exposes Fogg's crookedness and is awarded the contract for working the mine. In order to study the country around the mines, Zingo and his wife, Sari, erect huts in a nearby river to live in. Fogg, enraged at Zingo for exposing him, with the aid of a savage Indian tribe, attacks Zingo in his river home, and after a thrilling encounter, captures Zingo and Sari. They are bound hand and foot and told they are to be executed the next morning.

A pretty Indian girl sets Zingo free in the night, and rides off with him. Zingo calls on the Federal army and is honored by being given the rank of commanding officer. After reviewing his troops and submarine guards, Zingo attacks Fogg's troops, who use chloroform bombs and a special pneumatic sucker to repel his army. Zingo's submarine troops attack Fogg's deep water divers and after a severe encounter in the depths, Zingo's men are victorious. Vanquished under the sea, Fogg takes refuge in a huge motor balloon with Sari still in his power. After a most thrilling battle in which a dozen types of balloons are used, Zingo's dirigible manages to catch Fogg, and after transferring Sari, he cuts the ropes suspending the basket from the bag, and Fogg drops into eternity. Zingo sights his yacht directly below him and by lowering a rope and making it fast to the mast, they all descend and are joyously received by the crew. Zingo promises all to return home after settling up his business affairs in Mexico.

ZINGO AND THE WHITE ELEPHANT (Three Parts)—Zingo and his wife, Sari, who are returning from their adventures in Mexico, when Zingo learns from his newspaper that the Royal Elephant of Siam has been stolen and for whose return a large reward will be paid. Not content with settling down to a quiet domestic life, he persuades Sari and his good crew to aid him in finding this white elephant. In the Royal Square of the Capitol of Siam, he reviews the troops which are all comprised of women, which is the custom there. The Prime Minister bids Zingo and his men to visit the Royal Harem. Here they are captured by the troops and are about to be tortured to death when Sari, disguised as a colonel in the army, aids them in escaping. They find the province of Chokuff where the white elephant has been secreted, and catching the Prince making love to Sari, they demand the white elephant. He promises, but traps them all in his dungeon. They are all, but Zingo, placed in barrels with their heads protruding. Zingo flies away the bars of his cage, and rolls the barrels by the guards, who are in a stupor from opium smoking. He swims down the river, towing his crew in the barrels.

After a fierce encounter with the Prince of Chokuff's army, he attacks the Royal barge in the Blud River, and after a bitter struggle in which he disposes of the entire crew by throwing them overboard, he captures the white elephant and recovers his faithful Sari. He returns the sacred elephant to the King of Siam, and after a big reception by royalty and the populace, Zingo is awarded rich treasures for his noble work.

ZINGO IN AFRICA (Three Parts).—After returning from Asia with his jolly band of tars, laden with gold and precious stones as a reward for his clever work in recovering the Sacred White Elephant of Siam, Zingo thought he would never again feel the call of the sea—and he didn't for several months. But the wanderlust fever soon returned, and taking his wife as his sole companion, he set out for the wilds of Africa in search of fresh adventures. From this point on, let us follow Zingo down the Nile, and record his hairbreadth escapes. Selecting a likely spot, Zingo and Sari, his wife, make camp. Hearing piercing shrieks just back of their tent, they don bear skins and hasten to the spot in time to prevent the execution of two beautiful native girls by a band of savages. The two girls now become members of Zingo's party—happy to serve their gallant protector.

The next day Zingo puts on his armored hunting suit to battle with hungry lions, who have been prowling about the camp. After an hour's terrific

THE J. H. GENTER CO. Newburgh, N. Y. SENECA FALLS, N. Y. March 17, 1914.

Gentlemen:

We noticed in the last issue of the Moving Picture World a testimonial from Mr. George Morgan of the Morgan Theatre, Auburn, N. Y., in regard to his MIRROROIDE curtain. We have a curtain similar to this one which we purchased through the Auburn Film Co., of Auburn, N. Y., about six months ago and will state we started off using a plaster wall for our projection purposes but was induced through Mr. F. W. Spreter to install a MIRROROIDE.

We did not think very favorably of his proposition until he promised to put one in on trial. We, therefore, accepted his proposition and will candidly state that we never regretted for one instant the installation of this curtain.

It certainly is worthy of the name "curtain." We were running our economizer on 60 amperes before installing your curtain and after installing cut down to 40 amperes.

We are able to have a well lighted house which we could not have formerly and this eliminates ushers.

This testimonial is unsolicited. Our reasons for sending same were that we could hardly refrain from notifying you that we are delighted to think we installed a MIRROROIDE.

The seating capacity of our theatre is 750 and is absolutely fireproof, built especially for a picture house, including the latest type of Power's machines, and we think we have one of the best equipped theatres in this part of the state.

Trusting this communication will find you enjoying prosperity, we beg to remain.

Respectfully yours, RENAUD & FORNESI.

struggle with a pair of lions, Zingo returns to find his party gone, and many evidences of a struggle. Suspecting that they have been kidnapped by roving gorillas, Zingo sets off through the forest and eventually comes to the bottom of a large tree sheltering the crudely made gorilla nest. Having a smattering of monkey chatter, he quickly gains an entrance to the nest, and there discovers his wife and the girls more frightened than harmed. The good-natured gorillas listen attentively while Zingo explains that they must proceed up the Nile in their power boat, and they bid the party an affectionate farewell.

During an inspection of the Pyramids, Zingo and his party encounter some knavish artists, who drug him and make love to Sari and the native girls. Zingo is boxed up and sold to a London professor as a rare specimen, and does not regain his senses until weeks later. After startling the assembled professors out of their wits, he charters an aeroplane and flies back to Egypt over night in time to punish the cringing artists and save Sari and her servants from further insult. Then with a last fond look down the Nile River, Zingo and his party board the aeroplane and sail back to Paris.

IN MIZZOURA (Five parts).—In the town of Bowling Green, Missouri, there lives Jo Vernon, a village blacksmith, his wife and daughters, Kate and Elizabeth. Jim Radburn, a native and resident of the same town, is sheriff of Pike County. Since childhood he has planned that some day he and Kate Vernon are to be married, and unbeknown to her, although with the sanction of her father, he pays for her tuition through college. Sam Fowler, an express messenger on the Missouri Pacific R. R., is in love with Jim Radburn's sister, Emily, and with the beginning of the story he becomes engaged to her.

Robert Travers, alias "Jim Cummings," a hold-up man, forges the signature of the railroad division superintendent to an order permitting the bearer to ride in the express car with the express messenger, Fowler. As the train speeds on its way, Travers attacks and overpowers Fowler and robs the car. Travers makes his escape and Sam, accused by the express company of having been an accomplice, is thrown in jail. The hold-up happens in Pike County, and Radburn, the sheriff, sets out to run down the criminal. Through newspaper accounts of the robbery, Travers learns that Fowler has been unjustly imprisoned, and in accordance with his usual practice, writes to the editor advising him of Fowler's innocence, enclosing one of the express envelopes which were stolen as proof. Shortly after Travers drifts to the town of Bowling Green and by chance becomes acquainted with the Vernon family. He becomes enamored of Kate, who in turn gives him her love, discarding Jim Radburn, for the thought of the bigger, gayer and brighter life which Travers pictured. A letter sent to Kate by Travers planning their elopement comes to Kate's mother's attention, and she demands to see it. She shows it to Jim, who immediately recognizes a similarity in the handwriting of this note and the forged order which was delivered to the express messenger. Fowler, at the time of the robbery. Jim immediately begins to run down the clue to get his man.

Through the efforts of Jim, Sam is exonerated and reinstated by the railroad company, and during one of his trips to Bowling Green he accidentally meets up with and recognizes Travers in the village drug store. Travers makes his getaway in a wild fight, and jumping through the window, turns toward Kate's home for a hiding-place. Her father and family joining the mob in search of Travers, have left her alone. Jim, close on the trail of his man, traces him to the Vernon home, and there corners him. Because of his love for Kate, and to prevent possible injury to her name, he permits the escape of Travers, aiding him by giving him his own horse to ride across the border. Through a strange coincidence, shortly after the robbery while working for Sam's release, Jim, in caring for a homeless pup which has had its leg broken, discovers that the mud of the river bottom, or gumbo, if baked, would make a wonderful railroad red ballast. He visits the railroad officials at St. Louis and closes a most profitable contract. Because of his newer fields he resigns his position as sheriff a day before he meets up with Travers. Travers is arrested in a neighboring town by two countrymen, who recognize Jim's horse. Jim is telegraphed, and replies that everything is all right and that he has given the horse to the man Travers. Questioning Jim's explanation, the two men prepare to take Travers back to Bowling Green. He attempts escape and is shot. Jim has been nominated for legislature, and when his action in permitting Travers to escape becomes known, he is denounced in a public meeting by Col. Bollinger for having failed to fulfill his duties as sheriff. Jo Vernon, knowing of Jim's resignation, addresses the meeting and exonerates him. The townspeople, incited by Bollinger's speech, turn against Jim and start for his house to seek their vengeance. Jim meets them at the gate and warns them off, just as Jo arrives to explain to them that Jim Radburn had resigned as sheriff the day before. The better way is evidenced to Kate, and she learns that her love belongs to Jim.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

TESS OF THE STORM COUNTRY (Five Parts).—Tessibel Skinner, a wild, motherless little elf, lives with her father in a rude hut on the shore of Cayuga Lake. On account of the sudden and regular squalls on the lake, the vicinity is called the "Storm Country," while the poor and ignorant fisher-folk thereabout are generally known as "squatters." Tess is one of these people, and adores her uncouth father, who lives by poaching and the illegal netting of fish. One day he is found near the body of a murdered gamekeeper, with a rifle close by, containing one empty chamber. Skinner is accused of the murder and convicted on circumstantial evidence. Tess is frantic with grief and anxiety, but Frederick Graves, a handsome theological student, and his sister, Teola, befriend Tess. Frederick tells her of God, of whom she has never heard, and His written word, the Bible, and bids her pray and have faith. Tess steals a Bible from the Mission Church, painfully spells out the lessons taught her by Frederick, and the untutored girl's faith brings her a wonderful strength and hope. Professor Young, an eminent legal authority and an influence in the community, touched by her profound faith in a Power that will aid her father, interceded for Tess and secures a new trial for her father. Tess is happy over this evidence of God's love for her, but gives Frederick Graves more credit than she does the professor. Tess and Frederick meet again, and one day as they stand in the squalid hut, looking into each others eyes, Tess innocently receives her first kiss of love. Frederick loves and reveres the little ignorant girl for her pure nature and strong faith, and Tess, who hardly knows what has come into her bleak life, puts Frederick upon her pedestal of faith and almost worships him as a symbol of the God she does not understand. Elder Elias Graves, Frederick's father, a religious but bigoted and narrow man, the relentless enemy of the "squatters," does his best to secure the conviction of Tess's father. Teola Graves is betrothed to Dan Jordan, who perishes in a fire and leaves Teola worse than widow. Teola does not dare tell her proud, harsh father of her pitiful plight. Tess hears her weeping one day in the woods, and takes her to the hut, sheltering her there when her babe is born. To shield Teola, Tess takes the child and cares for it. Frederick finds the baby there on one of his calls, and circumstances force him to believe it is Tess's child. Rather than expose and disgrace his sister, who is now very ill, Tess allows him to believe the child hers, and he denounces her as a worthless woman, taking her Bible from her. Tess, seeing his cruel anger and unfaith, knows that her idol has fallen also, but declares that though he has taken her Bible, he cannot take away her God, and, left alone, falls on her knees in prayer. Her life now becomes a hard one, indeed. Her father is still in prison, Frederick avoids her, the other "squatters" comment openly on her "fall," and one of the fishermen persecutes and insults her, but she persists in her sacrifice for Teola and her faith in God. At last, in a tragically dramatic scene, Elder Graves publicly denounces Tess and the fatherless babe she holds to her breast. But Teola, roused by her father's denunciation of Tess, can remain silent no longer, and now comes forward and in the presence of the big assemblage takes her baby in her arms and claims it as her own. The proud Elder Graves is overwhelmed with shame and remorse, and Tess is freed from the shadow of disgrace. Teola and her sickly babe both die, and the Elder writes a pleading note to Tess for her forgiveness, which the humble Frederick bears to her. Tess, nobly understanding and forgiving all, goes to Frederick's waiting arms; another fisherman is found to be the murderer of the game-keeper; her father is liberated, and Tess finds the reward of her faith in a great love and happiness.

This incident and the loneliness of her life determines her future career. She joins the circus and becomes a successful trainer of wild beasts. While the circus is on a country road, Maria goes to a spring for water. She is there attacked by a giant snake, and is in the coils of the reptile when a passing hunter rescues her. The hunter, Marcellus, is attracted by Maria and returning to the circus with her, decides to become a trainer also. The two meet with great success and are on the road to fortune, when Vigo, their booking agent, forces his attentions upon Maria. In a tense scene in Maria's dressing-room Marcellus enters just as Vigo is forcing his unwelcome attentions upon the defenceless girl. Marcellus dismisses Vigo, and the latter, determined upon vengeance, poisons the tigers. One tiger, however, escapes the fate of its comrades, but is set at liberty by Vigo. Marcellus, who is dining at a cafe, is notified that the animal is at large. He rushes out and, donning his trainer's costume, pursues the tiger. After an exciting chase the tiger is cornered and cowering him with a revolver loaded with blank cartridges, Marcellus forces him back into his cage. Marcellus discovers that Vigo is the cause of his misfortunes and inveigles him to the cage of the solitary tiger. After a few moments of suspense Marcellus leads Vigo to the door of the cage and with a short, sharp struggle casts him to his destruction by the fangs of the tiger.

THE BANKER'S DAUGHTER (Five Parts).—Lawrence Westbrook, banker and club man, neglects his business for pleasure. His daughter, Lillian, is in love with Harold Routledge, a poor artist. The Count de Carojac also loves the banker's daughter. To make Harold jealous, Lillian flirts with the count, which causes a severe quarrel between the lovers.

John Strebelow, a friend of the family, suggests that the tired banker and his family join him in a visit to his hunting camp in the Maine woods. While hunting, Strebelow injures his hand. Lillian, with the quick wit of a woman, washes and bandages the wound, awakening love within John Strebelow's heart.

To save the name of Babbage and Westbrook, the banker pleads with his daughter to marry the rich John Strebelow. Loving Harold Routledge, but remembering the wish of her dying mother, makes the sacrifice. Six years later, Strebelow is living happily in Paris with his wife and child, Natalie. He meets Harold Routledge, now a famous artist, and invites him to call.

TO EXHIBITORS: We have created a sensation in Chicago by adding to our staff the great cartoonist of "Anxious Moments" fame,

Mr. George W. French

of the Chicago Record-Herald

who will produce a series of his own cartoons in moving pictures. The first picture, "GETTING A HUNCH," full of fun and entertaining interest, has just been completed.

After being shown to a number of newspaper men at a private exhibition, the unanimous comment was "never before was so complete a picture of the behind-the-scenes-business of a newspaper office offered to the public."

The sight of Lillian awakens the old love. The count, seeing a chance to be revenged, insults Harold Routledge at a reception of the American Embassy. A duel is arranged in which Routledge is killed. Strebelow swears revenge upon the death of his friend, and for his wife's honor, later kills the Count de Carojac.

The belief that his wife still loved Harold Routledge causes a separation between them. Strebelow tells of his great love for Lillian and vows to return as soon as Lillian proves that her love is true and sends for him. The sweet, imploring letters of his daughter, Natalie, bring a reconciliation between husband and wife, which is again broken, owing to Lillian's ignorance of the contents of these letters, which had been dictated by Aunt Fannie in the hopes of affecting this reconciliation. When the bonds of love seem to be broken again, Natalie shows Strebelow a letter written by her mother, the last appeal causing a final reunion.

UNION FEATURES

THE HOUSE OF CORRECTION (Three parts—Mar. 20).—George Lamere causes his loving father much pain. Finally George finds himself in a reformatory home. The home in which George finds himself is run by a so-called philanthropic magistrate. Consequently this reformatory is nothing more or less than a prison where boys are sent, at great expense to their parents, and then treated as if they were nothing more than animals. So badly are the boys treated in this particular home that many of them lose their reason entirely, while others become so weak that they can scarcely walk. This is a terrible punishment, indeed, for George, who has been reared in a kindly home.

Suddenly news begins to creep into the newspapers of the scandalous way in which the Montliot Reformatory is conducted. Youth escapes and dies in the hospital as a result of the brutal treatment of the warders. For a time things look very awkward, indeed, for the magistrate and his callous confederates. The inspector of prisons is commissioned to change the life of the poor little prisoners. They are given plenty of rest and good food, and soon begin to regain their former sprightliness. The inspector of prisons arrives in due course and is entertained by the governor of the reformatory and his charming wife. So good does this entertainment prove that the inspector is content to review the reformatory from a distance and then report upon it as a "very humane and valuable institution."

Directly after his departure the boys resume their old life again. The warders brutally assault them, and their food is of the poorest quality. One day a mutiny breaks out, and the boys overpower their warders and escape. In a short time the warders are upon their track and many of them are soon recaptured. This is not the case with George; he has been befriended by a big, strong-minded boy, who stands by him and helps him on his weary way. At last there comes a moment when the brutality of the reformatory does its work, and George sinks to the ground, too exhausted to make his last bid for freedom. His friend hides him in a barn and then leaves him.

In the meantime the truth of the whole matter leaks out, and the news of the mutiny spreads all over the country like wildfire. Mr. and Mrs. Lamere hasten to the reformatory, where they find that their son is among the fugitives. They go in search of him, and finally arrive close to the barn in which George is hidden. He lies there spent and helpless, and hearing voices without thinks that his tormentors have come to take him back again. Preferring death to confinement in the Merrible reformatory, he hangs himself from a rafter in the barn. When his father and mother enter they find him suspended there, but fortunately they arrive in time to take him down and restore him to consciousness. They take him back home again, determined that nothing shall part them in the future.

GREAT NORTHERN PREFERRED FEATURES

ACQUITTED (Four parts).—Count Von Teyn is a young officer in a cavalry regiment, and after a romantic courtship and marriage he unwittingly subscribes to a fund for the benefit of Miss Phoebe, a professional equestrienne. The latter thanks the Count by letter and asks that she be permitted to thank him in person. The letter falls into the hands of his wife, Lydia, and she witnesses the meeting and returns to her parents in a jealous rage. The Count later begs for forgiveness and a reconciliation follows.

In a race for the King's cup, Count Von Teyn is one of the principal riders and Lydia, in company with her millionaire father, Peter Romford, and many other notables, occupy box seats in the grandstand. During the steeplechase, Count Von Teyn is thrown from his mount and injured. The family physician calls in consultation two eminent specialists and they agree that the young nobleman has suffered injuries which will cause him to be a cripple for life. Lydia bears this news with fortitude, and resolves to devote the remainder of her life to the care of her husband.

The latter suffers intense agony and on one occasion attempts to gain possession of a revolver belonging to a brother officer, who is paying him a visit. Failing in this attempt to end his life, the Count implores his wife to furnish him with the means of self-destruction. As well as his helpless state will permit, he pictures the agonies which he must suffer until death brings relief and Lydia finally succumbs to his pleading and furnishes the medium. It is now her turn to bear the unspeakable suffering which possesses her at the mere thought of her act. The authorities charge her with the murder of her husband and she is placed on trial. She pleads her innocence after a scathing denunciation at the hands of the public prosecutor. The summing up of the judges is prolonged, but in the end, Lydia is acquitted and leaves the courtroom surrounded by her parents and friends.

LEADING PLAYER FILM CO.

THE SPARROW (Four parts).—Maffu, the old clown, out walking is greatly surprised to see a baby girl, fast asleep, holding in her hand a chunk of bread, at which a large number of sparrows are pecking. Maffu decides to take the child away with him and care for it. He does this, but upon arriving at the circus where he is employed, the owner and the rest of the company have but a cold greeting for the little newcomer. However, Maffu clings to the child. The Sparrow, as she is called, grows up and becomes the drudge of the circus. One evening, though worn out by fatigue and hunger, she must still prepare for the evening show. Scarcely has she mounted her horse and made a few rounds of the arena, when she falls and lies unconscious in the center of the arena.

Romarin is in a rage and strikes the girl. Maffu is disgusted and sends an official to the mayor, M. de Ganges, who that night happened to be a spectator. M. de Ganges takes the Sparrow with him to his home and she bids farewell to the only two beings she has ever loved—her adopted father and a poodle. Next morning, she can hardly believe that all the beautiful things about her are a reality. The dream is indeed but a fleeting one. The Sparrow is received with jeers and mockery when she puts in an appearance in the servants' dining-room for her meals. A few days later a horse runs away in the park and the Sparrow cleverly manages to master it. This makes the groom, Charley, madly jealous.

Charley abuses the Sparrow and a free fight ensues. M. de Ganges intervenes, and, disgusted with the groom's impudence, discharges him. The Sparrow is now received into the intimacy of the Mayor's family. She has fine clothes and jewels. A friend of the family, the banker Schlemmer, spends a few days at the mansion and is strangely attracted to the Sparrow. The attraction is not reciprocated, for, by degrees, the Sparrow falls in love with M. de Ganges. Alas! one day, she surprises him in a close embrace with his cousin. She is jealous. Schlemmer still persecutes the Sparrow to the extent of doing her violence. She decides to leave the house. In a few lines she thanks her benefactors for their goodness and announces her departure without, however, revealing its real cause.

The Sparrow signs a very profitable contract with a new circus and she forgets, to a certain extent, her former disappointments. However, her troubles are not over yet. Charley, engaged as groom at the circus, finds occasion to exercise his hatred. After a first performance, the Sparrow goes to her dressing-room to change her costume for a second appearance. When, on hearing a noise, she turns around, and is horrified to see Schlemmer, introduced there by the groom, and who endeavors to abuse the girl, who defends herself energetically. Fortunately for her, Maffu and the stage manager, wondering why she does not appear, enter her room and put an end to the trouble. Although not quite recovered from the shock, the Sparrow, nevertheless, takes her place on the central platform, where she is to perform her aerial act. M. de Ganges and his young wife are also spectators. In seeing the one she loves and who is forever lost to her, the Sparrow is painfully affected and, without ceasing to look at him, she makes a sudden leap, misses the rope along which she was to glide to earth, and crashes to the ground. Maffu, in tears, picks up the girl, whose back is broken, and carries her away. M. de Ganges, deeply moved, comes to her and the Sparrow has, at least, the consolation of beholding before her death the dear face of the loved one.

THE BLINDNESS OF INNOCENCE (Five parts).—Fougeray, a railroad employee and his wife, are celebrating on the same day the engagements of their two children, their son, Peter, and their daughter, Louise. Louise is engaged to Jean Leroy, who is also employed by the same railroad, and in his leisure hours gives much time to inventions.

One day when Louise is carrying breakfast to her father she walks along the tracks and is at the point of being run over by the express train when she is saved by Henry de Lachesnayes. With intrigue, vain promises and a mock marriage, Henry succeeds in making her forget her fiance. One day she is obliged to confess to her parents that she is unable to marry Jean Leroy because she is to become a mother. A few days later, Louise learns that Henry is going to marry a rich American girl, Miss Simpson. She is stunned, leaves the home of her parents, and goes to the church, where she comes face to face with Jean Leroy, who has been following her for many days. He now learns why Louise refused to become his wife. Jean goes to the house of the Countess Marsanges, and seeks an interview with Henry de Lachesnayes, whom he reproaches for his conduct. As Jean does not want to leave the house without a reply, Henry threatens him with his revolver. The Countess in trying to disarm her brother, accidentally kills him and then accuses Jean of having committed the murder, who, in spite of his denials, is condemned to ten years' imprisonment.

Five years elapse. Louise has a son, but she and her parents struggle on. There is scarcely any bread in the house. The three of them decide to die and take advantage of the occasion when their son, Peter, his wife and children, take out little Albert to put their plan into execution. The unhappy ones are about to succumb when Louise's son returns and saves his mother and grandparents.

The Countess Marsanges is on the point of being arrested for having taken a large amount of money from the treasury of the home, when under the weight of threatening danger and remorse over the committed crime, she informs the commissioner of police that she is the real murderer of her brother. Jean Leroy is set free and awaits his rehabilitation. The young man goes again to the house of the Fougerays and will marry Louise, whom he has never ceased to love, in spite of her error, and is willing to recognize little Albert as his son.

As good fortune usually reigns on all sides, Jean Leroy receives the following letter:

Dear Sir—From the papers I have learned that you are innocent man and will soon be rehabilitated. I hasten to inform you that your invention of which I have the drawings has been patented and offer you 100,000 francs for same.

Signed, G. Arnel, Chief Engineer.

THE BLUE MOUSE (Six Parts).—Teddie Barker, an employee of the Searchlight Insurance Company, falls in love with Clara Brummer. Her father does not, at first, acquiesce to the engagement, but after persuasion agrees and attends the marriage of his daughter, and promises a dowry of £5,000 when the young man attains the position of branch manager in his company.

Mr. Bock, the director of the insurance company, has a weakness for granting concessions to his employees who have fascinating wives. Bumble, is general factotum, is well aware of this, and when Teddie calls for an interview, he advises him as to the necessary ways and means, and shows the methods of his colleague, John Bains, for advancement. Teddie has a most unsatisfactory interview with the director, and Bumble then advises him that if his wife is prettier than Mr. John Bains', and he will bring her along, his appointment is certain. Teddie is very downhearted, but eventually he is smitten with a brilliant idea. He will persuade one of the habitues of a famous dancing hall to impersonate his wife. Miss Dolly Frivolous, known to her many admirers as "The Blue Mouse," readily agrees to his proposition, and for a payment of £5 consents to appear as his wife, until she can influence Mr. Bock to promote Teddie to a position as manager. Teddie introduces "The Blue Mouse" as his wife to Mr. Bock outside their offices, and the director is quickly captivated. He insists on driving them to No. 14 Park street, the home of "The Blue Mouse."

The following morning in the presence of Mr. Barker is requested by the director, and he is promoted to a higher post, but not yet a branch manager, and occupies the office adjoining his chief. Teddie is in high spirits, and writes to "The Blue Mouse" asking her to come to his office that evening and to bring her photograph. Mr. Bock appears on the scene when the pseudo wife arrives, and advises more than ever enamored with the lady. The wife of another of his clerks sees the frivolity between Mr. Bock and "The Blue Mouse," and follows the lady home and finds out who she is, and promptly writes an anonymous letter to Mrs. Bock, which causes the director's domestic happiness to be disturbed.

Teddie and "The Blue Mouse" now arrange that they will endeavor to bring matters to a climax, and a letter is written by Dolly to his director asking that her husband may be sent away, and suggests that she should like to have dinner with him. Teddie is ordered to a northern bank, and Mrs. Bock is advised that her husband will not be home until late. Mrs. Barker's father, Mr. Brummer, is anxious for his son-in-law's success, and calls at his office, interviews the director, and informs him he has just left his daughter's house at 30 Linden street. Mr. Bock having recently driven to No. 14 Park street with Teddie and his wife ("The Blue Mouse") a dispute arises as to Mr. Barker's address. The real Mrs. Barker appears opportunely at the office and appeases the excitement of Mr. Brummer, but she is believed to be "The Blue Mouse" by Mr. Bock. Mr. Barker returns and is upbraided by Mr. Bock for his infidelity to his wife. Complications are now approaching a crisis.

The plot moves to the residence of "The Blue Mouse." Mr. Brummer arrives at her house to clear the doubts in his mind as to his son-in-law's address and is satisfied that there must be two "Teddie Barkers." Mr. Bock now appears and is cajoled by Dolly into signing a letter appointing Mr. Teddie Barker a branch manager, and thus fulfills her part of the contract. "The Blue Mouse" is in debt and a sale of her furniture takes place, which is surely on novel lines. A band and light refreshments to entice prospective buyers and some amusing scenes are enacted when Mrs. Barker and Mrs. Bock attend the sale while their husbands are endeavoring to hide from them in the house.

MR. OPERATOR

How Would You Feel if an Oculist Told You You Had to Give Up the Operating Business?

We positively do not know how much harm 15 years of operating is going to do to any operator, but we do know that if you will examine the eyes of the men who have been operating an arc lamp for the past seven years, you will find that 90% of them have bloodshot eyes!

WE CHALLENGE THE WORLD to produce an Eye Protector that is better adapted for the use of moving picture operators than the Marco Eye Protector. The Marco Eye Protector is "ALL METAL," protects the eyes from the intense rays of the arc lamp "WITHOUT THE NECESSITY OF COVERING THEM," and is guaranteed for one year. Mailed to any address in the United States or Canada, postpaid, upon receipt of $2.00 in currency, draft or money order.

REPUTATION vs. DOLLARS

1914 Model

NOT CONTENT with our star being made of tool steel and hardened, we are now grinding the star in a specially designed machine and hardening and grinding the cam, and all the bushing in the Framing Device.

We could have used brittle die cast parts made of zinc and lead in our Mechanism, and after our guarantee expired we could have made lots of money furnishing repair parts that were moulded in dies, as others have done, but this is not the REPUTATION which is behind the MOTIOGRAPH. We have stood for QUALITY REGARDLESS OF COST.

Our 1914 Model MOTIOGRAPH is now ready for delivery, and has many changes, such as Lamphouse brace, new model Arc-lamp, new Framing-device, hardened and ground star and cam. All these changes have been expensive, but the price remains the same.

Besides ROCK STEADY PICTURES, THE LIFE OF THE MOTIOGRAPH HAS BEEN FIVE TIMES THAT OF ANY OTHER MACHINE.

Order a 1914 MOTIOGRAPH, and you will have a machine of QUALITY with a small up-keep.

TRADE MARK

IN FLAMING ARC LIGHTING, it is not so much the construction of the lamp that insures a brilliant light, but the quality of the carbons. The lamp itself is only the agency for maintaining the arc in operation. In the converging type of flaming arc lamp, the "Excello" Flaming Carbons have proved their efficiency. They are made to give yellow, pearl, brilliant white and red light, and can be used in any type of converging arc lamp.

The ASCO TICKET CHOPPER

The last word in choppers. The proper system for theaters, dance halls and all places where tickets are used.

A New Idea Just what the theater and amusement place owners have wanted for their entrance. Necessity is the mother of invention. That is why we made the ASCO. It was needed, demanded, and the ASCO grants their every wish and demand.

WHY?

The ASCO takes up but little space. Mutilates the tickets entirely or only partially destroys them so numbers can be read.

Cutting Rollers cannot be injured should Coins or Checks be accidently dropped into Chopper.

Appearance, none better nor nearly as good. Cabinets the best. Trimmings regular. All nickel plated. Special trimmings solid bronze.

The ASCO DUPLEX

CHOPPER AND PASS BOX

The Duplex has compartment for passes. A complete system for checking up. Don't hang on to the old stuff. Make your show business look correct.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

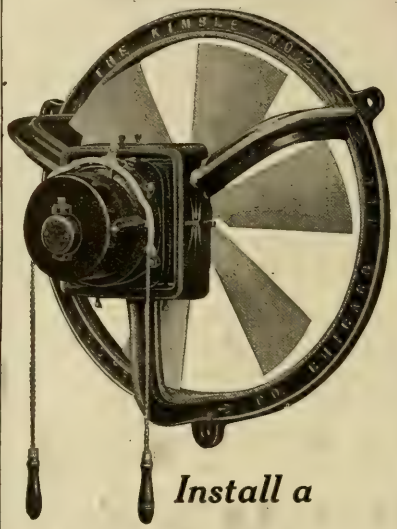
Make Yours The Best Ventilated Movie in Town



Install a

KIMBLE

Alternating-Current

FAN

The one fan, mind you, is either intake or exhaust. Simply pull the chain to reverse it. You can use it to draw in fresh air or to force out foul air.

And it's variable speed, too. By regulating the distance you pull the chain you can run it at high speed, low speed or any of the many speeds in between. Suit the ventilation to the size of the audience.

You save money, also. Kimble Fans start on extremely low current. And they reduce operating cost in direct proportion to reductions in sped. Run them at half speed and they use only half as much current as at full speed.

Remember! No other alternating-current ventilating fan can offer you such great advantages. You get this ventilating efficiency and economy only with the Kimble.

We can give you convincing facts and proofs. Write for our Red Fan Catalogue.

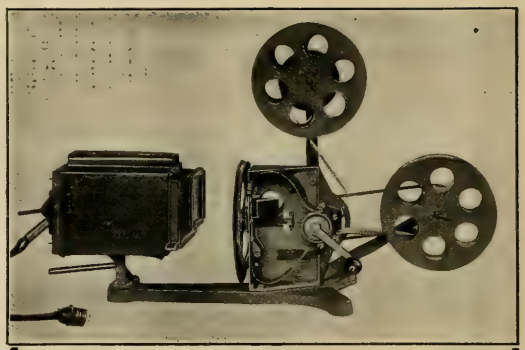
KIMBLE MOTORS



THE PHANTOSCOPE is a motion picture projector, for home, school or salesman.

It uses standard film, which can be rented in every large city, and with hundreds of thousands of subjects to choose from.

Is fitted with lenses standard the world over, the same lenses found on machines costing three and four times as much.

Has a thousand candle-power lamp, producing a picture eight feet wide, at a distance of from 15 to 60 feet, in city or country district.

Turns so easily that a short, light crank is sufficient, for there is but one sprocket and one pair of gears; though you can get it motor-driven if you wish.

And it weighs but 18 pounds, is beautifully finished in nickel-plate, buffed-oxidizing, and satin enamel, with felt feet which will not mar the finest table or desk.

Has patented mechanism giving 92% light efficiency, and a rheostat inclosed in the lamp-house, which is also a patented feature, of which it is intended that this shall be lawful notice to infringers.

Used and highly endorsed by the United States Army. Biggest Sensation in the Moving Picture World. Can be operated by a boy 10 years old. One customer writes: "Plant running like a top and delivering the 'juice' right along every day for our moving picture house. Costs us about one-tenth as much as public service. Also pumps water to all our buildings, 2,000 gallons per day."

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Please Don't Use Sensational and Unclean Films When the Same Rental Figure Gets You "IMAR THE SERVITOR!"

It is more than we can understand how an exhibitor will book cheap, unclean features when he can get one that Daniel CarsonGoodman, the big author, wrote, and William Garwood, the most popular actor in pictures, "starred" in. Dr. Goodman, you know, is the writer whom John Macy, literary critic of the Boston Herald, said would have a monument erected to him on Boston Common in a hundred years from to-day. WHEN HE WRITES A FEATURE WHY PAY ANY ATTENTION AT ALL TO "CHEAP" FEATURES, from the pens of unknown authors? Why be bothered with features full of players of whom you never heard WHEN "IMAR THE SERVITOR" HAS A GARWOOD IN THE TITLE ROLE? Better see Mr. Continental to-day.

On the regular program is "The Surgeon's Experiment," two reels, Sunday, March 29, featuring an experiment unique in surgical annals that will interest the layman, nevertheless. "In the Spider's Web," one reel, Tuesday, March 31, a very gripping drama with some new "twists" in the action.

Dear Sirs:-

We beg to give you the following particulars of the trial for Projectors to be used on long throws:- In July last year, the Finsbury Park Skating Rink, London, was opened as a picture house. This hall seats three thousand people, has a 180 ft. throw and a 34 ft picture. The Directors already had the Tottenham Skating Rink, 150 ft. throw, and the Clapton Skating Rink, 140 ft. throw, but desired to find a projector to give them better results than they were obtaining.

The trial was held at the Tottenham Rink, five or six makes taking part. The machines used were the best known American, English, French and German and in each case a projector was installed for a week running opposite the machine they were then using. After the preliminary trial two projectors were left, namely a Power's machine and the best known English make. The final trial between these two resulted in the selection of the Power's.

So pleased were the Directors with the results obtained at Finsbury Park that we have since installed Power's in the following theatres for this circuit alone:-

Tottenham Skating Rink,	150 ft.	2 machines.
Clapton Skating Rink,	140 ft.	" "
Hampstead Picture) Playhouse)	140 ft.	" "
Wolverhampton Picture) Playhouse)	160 ft.	" "
Crouch End Hippodrome	140 ft.	" "

and we have an order for a new Kilburn Palace now building (the largest existing cinema theatre in the British Isles) 240 ft. throw.

We have machines running on similar throws in other parts of the country, but we are particularly pleased with the results obtained on this circuit as the Directors had a certain prejudice against your machine owing to misunderstanding, and the repeat orders have been obtained more by the Power's machine itself than by the efforts of our Salesman.

Yours faithfully,

For the "Walturdaw" Co. Ltd.

Read this extract from this soul-stirring story of romance depicting a daughter's loyalty and a lover's devotion:

"Skimming through the air like a swallow flew the airship, the rapid vibrations of the engine beating a tattoo on the heart of the excited girl, who was urging the aviator to increased speed—a speed which had already almost attained the danger point. Out over the waters of the blue Pacific they shot, the excited girl always pointing in the direction of the volume of smoke, marking the passage of the fast out-going liner carrying with it the secret that would clear up the mystery, restore a lover to his rank and remove the stains from the character of a devoted father."

Gentlemen:-

We think it our duty to express our opinion of A PRINCESS OF BAGDAD, and it affords us a great deal of pleasure to say that this photoplay is the biggest money-maker that we have ever had. In a certain section of Philadelphia, three houses repeated the show, each within a few blocks of one another, and each house did more than the one that preceded it.

Helen Gardner is a great drawing card, and one exhibitor, who has been in the business for a number of years, tells us that he had to turn away about 1000 people in one evening.

It would take up a great deal of time and space to tell you all we think of this production, but we must extend to you our heartiest congratulations in getting up so great a picture. The photography is beautiful and the acting superb, and if you keep on making pictures of such quality, we are certain that you will meet with the greatest success.

We best wishes, we beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

IT won't be long before you'll hear a lot of exhibitors say they had a chance to book the sterling, house-packing features of the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company, but that they thought they'd wait awhile. And then they'll lament because they didn't act—because one of their competitors got in ahead of them.

That's the history of all good things. Hundreds of men have stubbed their toes on gold mines, but didn't have enough gumption to stick a pick in the ground and turn up the yellow metal. Someone came along with a little more initiative and captured the prize.

It is impossible for everybody in New York City and State, Northern New Jersey and New England, to do business with the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company, but it will have the best of them, and they will be protected—they will control its features in their particular territories and can keep them just as long as they want them.

There is only one price. That price is low considering the quality of the pictures and the character of the plays. No exhibitor can get them for less, nor can one exhibitor take them from another by paying more. In fact, the question of price cannot be argued. It is absolutely settled on fair basis — fair to the exhibitor and fair to the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company.

It has been demonstrated that these features are sure-fire money getters—
That they draw larger crowds—
That they build business and create good will—
That they are the best obtainable, and—
That those exhibitors who get in line now are the exhibitors who will wind up the year with the biggest profits.

If you are located in New York City or State, Northern New Jersey or either of the New England States, get in touch with us at once.

MARGARET MEETS BRUCE McRAE

Nobody ever Had Such a Jolly Time All the Time as

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

And the Jolliest Times of All are Shown in the Twelfth Reel of this Epoch-Making Serial Film.

Lucky, pretty Margaret is always revelling in more beautiful clothes, meeting all the prominent people of the day, and literally having no wish that is not immediately gratified by her indulgent aunt. No wonder that all the girls from Boston to Los Angeles are envious of this young lady! No wonder they all wish they could live like

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

What does Margaret do this week? First and foremost she meets Bruce McRae, the leading man in that great current theatrical hit, "Nearly Married," who is one of the favorite matinee idols of the gay metropolis. Also, she is introduced to Commander Evans, who was second in command on Captain Scott's famous but ill-fated Antarctic expedition; and she visits such points of interest as Grant's Tomb, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument and Old Trinity Church. In addition to all this, she meets the champion markswoman of the world at the Sportsman's Show. But nothing ever appeals to Margaret more strongly than which seems to her to be the one never-ceasing, always-changing Novelty of New York.

THE GREAT WHITE WAY

Meanwhile, the Battle of Torreon, which has developed into the Greatest Conflict on North American Soil since the Days of 1865, is Actually Being Photographed in Detail by Mutual Camera Men for which will be rushed to completion the moment that this greatest event of Villa's career has passed into history.

Wood B. and his friend Darby are flat broke. They break into high society, Wood B. now pursuing an heiress, but they don't know how to act. They transgress all the rules of etiquette until Wood B. gives papa a bath with a syphon and tears mamma's lace dress to pieces. Then papa starts after Wood B. with a huge sword and our hero escapes via the dumbwaiter with papa tearing up and down stairs in hot pursuit.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD desires to congratulate and to commend for general imitation the step recently taken by an exhibitor in a Western state, who appeared before the pastor of a church in response to a summons for reasons why the motion picture theater ought to be allowed to open on Sundays. The exhibitor in accepting the invitation to plead the cause of the modern Sunday made most excellent use of his opportunity. He delivered his address, which is printed in another part of this issue before a gathering presided over by the minister. We have never seen the case for a modern Sunday stated more fully, more forcefully and more logically than in the short speech of this exhibitor. Starting on the proposition "that the best of the present-day moving pictures are not harmful and that it is not harmful to run them on week-days," he asked this question: "Should we stop doing something on Sundays that is at the present doing a great good on all week days?" He maintains "that at the very least 2,000,000 out of the 8,000,000 who frequent theaters on Sundays cannot and do not go on week days." We like the way our correspondent meets the objection that "it is a sin to do anything on Sunday that is done for business." He calls attention to the fact that, in our complex modern civilization with its thousands of arteries extending into the life of every society and every individual, a literal observance of the old Jewish Sabbath would be utterly unreasonable. There is one argument which our friend might have used in addition to his others. He might have pointed out that the fanatical observance of the Sabbath is not a Christian, but a strictly Pharasaical institution and that, in the doctrine of the founder of the Christian religion, "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." The great improvement in the personnel of exhibitors could not be demonstrated more emphatically than by the growing number of exhibitors who are able to plead the cause of the motion picture before any audience which is willing to give them a hearing.

AGAIN we wish to record our sympathy for both living and dead authors whose works have fallen into the hands of cheap producers. In the case of the living authors our sympathy is tempered with the knowledge of the fact that they were paid for what afterward happened to either their drama or their story. From recent observations, however, we are very much inclined to think that if some of these authors had been able to see the mutilation of the children of their muse no amount of money would have induced them to consent to the transaction. We hate the word "movie," but here is one good use for it: Some of these legitimate dramas have been "movied" not "filmed." It is impossible to picturize a great drama or a great story with the five-dollar-a-day artists who have become the backbone of so many old-fashioned single reels.

MOVING picture men all over the country have been asking themselves: What is the trouble with Canada? From all accounts Canada is far from being a paradise for showmen in general or for motion-picture exhibitors in particular. But recently we commented upon the drastic measures and especially the exorbitant taxes on motion pictures in Western Canada. It is well known that the censorship of the Canadian authorities is draconic in its severity and that there is no appeal from the official censorship. The latest piece of hostile legislation against the motion-picture interests in Canada has just been proposed in British Columbia, where it is planned to vest the Lieutenant-Governor with the power of putting a special tax on all film exchanges and also to put the theaters under an added contribution. This will hit the exhibitors in the larger cities very hard for they are paying as high as $150 per year to the municipal authorities. Sunday prohibition prevails through the greater part of the Dominion. We would advise the moving picture men in Canada to get together. The proper way of dealing with the enemy is to present a solid front and for this purpose exchanges and exhibitors ought to co-operate.

WE have always contended that there was nothing in the laws of the State of New York prohibiting the exhibition of motion pictures on Sundays, and this view we based on the decisions of the Appellate Division in the first department. A test case has now been made in the city of Albany, where an exhibitor submitted to arrest for having conducted a motion picture entertainment on Sunday. The District Attorney admits in a public statement that he is at a loss how to prosecute the exhibitor, because the courts in this state have held that motion picture shows are not theatrical performances and do not disturb the peace of the Sabbath. As a matter of fact, motion pictures had been running on Sundays in Rochester and Buffalo for some time past, and the prosecutors, being aware of the judicial decisions, had not attempted to interfere.

The Mission of Reviewers

By W. Stephen Bush.

BUT a very short time ago a well-known film man, whose prosperity depends on his judgment of motion pictures, told the writer of these lines that the reviews in The Moving Picture World were easily worth a dollar a week not only to him but to at least a thousand other men similarly situated. In London the big men in the film-world have their own private viewers who go up and down the highways of the motion picture market, gather impressions and send them to their employers. These viewers are not always men of great literary accomplishments nor do they always boast of academic training. They are often men who have either been exhibitors themselves or who have acquired the ability to gauge public taste and to see with the eyes of their principals.

In this country no special viewers are needed for the functions of criticism are on the whole discharged with remarkable fairness and with the predominating desire to benefit the man who wants to know what is grain in the kinematographic field and what is mere chaff.

A system of reviewing, which is both equitable and comprehensive, is to-day an absolute necessity to the motion-picture field. It is more necessary than ever before, because conditions have changed radically within the last year or so. The number of producers has increased and is increasing almost every day. The old method of following one particular kind of service is practically a thing of the past. The exhibitor must have some guide that he can depend upon and it is very clear that the press agent, whose uses we do not at all seek to belittle, is not an unbiased guide. He very naturally seeks to promote the peculiar interests of the man who pays him his salary. The exhibitor, the buyer and the exchange man, therefore, look to some reliable source of information which is wholly independent of any single individual or set of individuals.

Releases of multiple reel features are for the most part as irregular as they are numerous. Amid a mass of offers, all of them highly praised by their authors, the exhibitor is likely to become bewildered. As selection of his own program can no longer be avoided by the exhibitor, he must exercise his own judgment. As it is a physical impossibility for him to see all the new films and features himself he must rely on the judgment of others as that judgment commends itself to him. Hence the greater and steadily growing duty of throwing light on all products of any importance and giving the readers the knowledge without which they would soon come to a standstill.

This is an age of specialization. The exhibition of motion pictures is no longer the simple process of four and five years ago. The exhibitor today is in competition with the best and cleverest men in the managerial profession and he needs every aid which he can get. A hundred problems confront him today and more may confront him tomorrow. To win he must excel. His advertising methods must be fully as good and as effective as those of his competitors; he must have a film service that is adjusted as nicely possible to the needs and tastes of his audience. To be sure of pleasing he must have both variety and quality. It is therefore part of his daily bread and butter to judge films, to reject what he cannot use and to cull out what is clientele calls for.

Nor is the benefit of these reviews confined to exhibitor alone. The producer who is anxious for the buyer of his products to make money and who knows that intelligent co-operation between himself and the distributor and exhibitor is the only sound basis for continued prosperity will never object to the work of the reviewer. Granting that the reviewer, being only human, makes mistakes, it is far better to have criticism subject to occasional errors than to have no criticism at all. There are producers who do object to criticism and who complacently look upon their trade mark as a talisman that cures all kinds of imperfections. These men do not care whether the buyer of their films will make money or whether he will at least have a good chance to realize a profit. What they want to do is to sell their films, even with the knowledge that the transaction must result in a heavy loss to the purchaser. In other words, all these get-rich-quick men who want to glut the market with inferior productions are the unforgiving enemies of all criticism, however fair and justified such criticism may be in fact. They are also the uncompromising foes of quality.

It is much easier to fool the exhibitor than to fool the public. The tragedy of the situation lies in the fact that the fooled exhibitor often fails to fool the public. He has listened to the men financially interested in a certain production. This production is praised to him by these men as "one of the masterpieces of the age." It may be such a masterpiece, but is it not common sense for the intending buyer to look for disinterested counsel? Is it not good policy for him to consider the opinion of unbiased critics who have no financial interest in the production whatever, and who are honestly trying to judge from the viewpoint of the public?

Not so long ago an advertiser in discussing a review in The Moving Picture World showed some telegrams from exhibitors who had read the comments on his production and had on the strength of them cancelled their bookings. The advertiser thought such a position on the part of The Moving Picture World was untenable. For his benefit and the benefit of others similarly beclouded we think it well to set down once more the words of the founder of this paper:

"We owe to our subscribers a duty that means more to us than immediate personal gain. If we refuse to say that black is white it is because we honestly believe and know that black is not white. If for a consideration we should allow ourselves to be tempted to persuade our readers to the contrary we should not deserve their support and would not be serving the best interests of the business as a whole, which is the mission of this paper and the only motive that dictates its policy."

These words will be found on the front page of The Moving Picture World of October, 1910, and they are just as true today as they wer then. The reviewers will continue to do their duty.

It may be that some day in the near future we may see a great procession wend its way up Broadway toward a huge stake planted in the very centre of Long Acre Square, the reviewers in regulation San Benitos—yellow robes painted with black devils—slowly led up to the pile of faggots fastened to the stake and a blazing torch in the hands of a producer in the guise of an executioner. An element of extra torture might be added by compelling the reviewers to look at five of the worst pictures ever made, just before the faggots are kindled. If such an auto-da-fe ever comes we want to be numbered with the other martyrs and by our heroic conduct prompt the writing of glorious epitaphs.

Stage Plays

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE stage play in its completed state results from the co-ordination of many factors, but those pertaining to the influence of environment on character and the determining motive for action have brought into prominence exactly what makes moving pictures more effective than all but the finest of such dramas. Exactly the environment sought to determine the motive of action can be visualized by screen portrayal in a natural manner, whereas, on the stage, all but the most artistic settings have the old unconvincing flavor of artificiality. On this account, screen interpretations often improve on footlight versions and bring out new beauties only suggested, only suspected, in those of the box set.

Performers do more real acting in the photodrama than on the stage, and it has been found possible to draw character completely to the eye. The protracted silence of the picture show and the enforced concentration of attention on a subject make it possible to stimulate the imagination to such a pitch that fine acting is highly appreciated. But it seems open to question if all these advantages compensate for the loss of that thrill only the human voice can quicken and the still greater loss of what the performer can exhibit of his personality to other senses than that of vision. Perhaps the latter point can be best illustrated by the difference in our sentiments when we watch a performer skilfully play the piano and when we watch an equally good performer manipulate the player-piano. Our generous prompting to reward merit with applause cannot be gratified in the latter case nor in the case of a well-acted photodrama. The intervening presence of a machine destroys the pleasure of direct communication.

To those of us who care for the music alone, it is possible to listen and enjoy without seeing. To those of us who care for the story alone, it is possible to see and enjoy without hearing. The stage play that tells such a good story that the acting is only a medium of communication can often be visualized to advantage, can be improved by screen visualization, but such dramas are hard to find. In consequence, now that the trend is to revive a vast number of stage productions, picture-show audiences will have to sit through a lot of misrepresentations of what may have done good service in days gone by, but which have nothing new, vigorous or entertaining to offer. Such plays, bearing neither on our spiritual development, nor on our material welfare, depicting neither our trials nor our triumphs, mere attempts to revitalize what has been shelved for good and sufficient reasons, may offer certain advantages to producers, and may bring into the field some good actors, but a very large percentage of them, especially those not treated with a free hand in reconstruction, will not benefit the exhibitor and may detract from public interest in moving pictures.

There is a question of judgment involved, a judgment liable to be perverted by the past success of a stage presentation, whereas the principal thing to be considered is the fact that people who go to the picture show like best to read a good story on the screen, a story that appeals to all rather than to this or that class or section. Then it must be remembered that many stage plays now being revived have been told on the screen under other names and with a few changes in construction. One of the first things a director does on entering a motion-picture studio is to use the plots of every old drama he can think of. That is his "Easiest Way" to make a showing.

In the good old days of promiscuous plagiarism, shortly after pictured motion ceased to be a novelty and pictured emotion was in demand for the first time, I remember seeing, in one year, no less than seven representations of one story. This copying had its amusing features then, but it is doubtful whether people now care to be amused in that way. If a producer is at loss to know what an audience would enjoy most, let him select the kind of a story he would thoroughly enjoy if adequately set forth on the screen by some other producer, the kind that would afford him so much pleasure that he would go out of his way to see it presented, and even take his friends along. Does it offer something of gripping and vital interest that can hold rigid attention for an hour or two. This is not an infallible method, but it is better in many respects than any method that fails to recognize in drama or photodrama a living thing—a living thing is a growing thing. We are constantly growing, and a successful play naturally derives its inspiration from the attitude of the public mind.

An enormous number of stage plays have been written by men who have acquired a knack and a pull, theatrical hacks without any more intellectual grasp than an anemic mollycoddle just out of college. True artists are rare because of the temptations of commercialism—their situation is almost as bad as that of true poets, so far as reward for effort is concerned. A true artist must be in love with his work to the exclusion of all other considerations if they interfere with his revelative and redemptive attitude towards life. Only a true artist can write a stage play that goes beneath the surface indications of character into those thoughts and emotions that constitute the fundamental structure of modern drama.

If About to Visualize a Stage Play, Don't.—1st, in case it has nothing to offer that has not already been done on the screen over and over again—2nd, if there is no other reason than that it has done very well in its original form, somewhere or other, at some time or other, in years gone by—3d, if its sole claim to distinction is the name of the man who wrote it, and who possibly felt sorry for it ever afterwards—4th, if you expect to put it over with anything like the same form and treatment, for screen visualization is an entirely different art, at its best when free from the artificial limitations imposed by dramatic construction for stage performance—5th, if you expect to make a five-reel feature out of a pigeon-hole drama, because the latter amplifies the little and the near, and because moving pictures, in spite of the limited scope of the actual scene, stimulate imagination by a more sweeping view of the story to be told.

The stage play in three or four snapshots is shown by methods exactly opposite to those used in successful photodramas. A theatrical presentation is what a great modern playwright defines as "an eavesdropping convention"—we overhear what is said at three or four intense periods of a human story. The photodrama intended to hold an audience for two hours may have a hundred or more scenes scattered over an extended period of time, or a limited one, and requires free handling. It may be set on Nature's own stage, amid heavy forests, along surf-beaten shores, enlarging our field of vision, poetic rather than prosaic, impressionistic in atmosphere, rather than artificially realistic. Its art is all its own. Though it may come as a shock to minds theatrical, the future stage play of unqualified success may be adapted from moving pictures.

"The Spoilers."

Rex E. Beach's Famous Romance of Alaska Realistically Visualized in Nine Reels by the Selig Polyscope Co.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE inaugural presentation of "The Spoilers" at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, on Wednesday, March 25, was given before a notable audience. About two thousand people took advantage of the invitations sent out by the Selig Polyscope Company, and they represented leading men and women in the professions, business and art and society circles. Some of them, no doubt, viewed moving pictures for the first time; but the frequent applause that marked the telling incidents showed that all enjoyed the occasion with an enthusiasm akin to that of a schoolboy.

When one views a moving picture for the first time, as I did in this case, and is a witness of the impressions created on the minds of such a distinguished gathering, he cannot help feeling that any review of his will be inadequate without a due consideration of the intelligent opinions of the many others. In a word, my opinion at the close of the presentation was that the story is a great one, and that it has been filmed in a way that is also great—great in direction, acting and photography—and that opinion was made still stronger by the clearly expressed opinions of the many others in the select audience.

I have read the Beach romance several times, and I must confess that it has always held me in thrall—not at points, but all the way through. It is a red-blooded story, saturated through and through with the spirit of the "Old West"—the West of the forty-niners, although it treats of the middle nineties. The old California of the earlier years was recreated at Dawson and Nome, by reason of the isolation of far Alaskan points from the national government. Law in its technical operation was unknown. Men protected their rights by might, either by brawn or gun, when elemental justice was violated. And everyone knows that this law of might is exceedingly dangerous, but much more so when the semblance and not the spirit of the law is set working.

The Rex Beach story shows that an iniquitous scheme was plotted and hatched in Washington by which the semblance of law was placed in power at Nome; and it shows in most convincing fashion that men's sense of elemental justice won out against it. This sense of elemental justice in all of us forces us heart and soul to espouse the cause of the miners, led by Glenister, rather than that of McNamara, the worst political crook in Washington.

"The Spoilers" in film form, in this sense, appeals to us even more strongly than the book of Rex Beach. We view the living scenes in which plot and counterplot are launched, and watch the principals as they play their parts, whether behind doors or in the open. And we view finally that overpowering scene, where Glenister—man against man and not with advantage—meets his foe in physical combat, and breaks him with his bare hands. It all seems so real and so just that we whisper, between breaths, "Amen."

THE CAST.

Glenister	William Farnum
Cherry Malotte	Kathlyn Williams
Helen Chester	Bessie Eyton
Dextry	Frank Clark
Slap-Jack	Jack McDonald
McNamara	Thos. Santschi
Broncho Kid	Wheeler Oakman
Judge Stillman	N. MacGreagor
Struve	W. H. Ryno

Director Colin Campbell is entitled to first mention for his able production of the story and fine judgment in assigning the cast. He has been exceedingly happy in filling the parts of Slap-Jack, Judge Stillman, Broncho Kid and Struve, which must have worried him much more than by assigning the principal roles. And I must also compliment him on his selection of the man who serves as keeper of the roadhouse. That fellow, as he appears in character, is a fitting bosom friend of the unscrupulous scoundrel, Struve. Just size them up and see how well they harmonize, in visage and otherwise.

As for Slap-Jack, he is a godsend; for, if he had been made to order he could not have suited better. He is a perfect riot for laughter when he appears in action—yet all unwittingly. Like Topsy, he just growed up.

William Farnum appears exceedingly well as Glenister, his first venture in photodramatic art. It is a well studied part; for this headstrong young miner, permeated, as he is, with elemental Americanism and not overburdened with the refining influences of polite society, is a mighty hard character to portray, if one views him from the appealing point. He is force personified; a man who takes what he wants—yet is honest withal.

Glenister to Helen's Rescue—Scene from "The Spoilers."

Tom Santschi is a splendid opposite, in the part of McNamara. Indeed, he loses nothing by comparison, and holds the eye at all times when he is on the screen. Dextry is a fitting partner for Glenister, as Frank Clark reveals him, and commands the admiration of the intelligent for fine characterization. Like Slap-Jack he was born for the part.

Miss Kathlyn Williams, in the fine role of Cherry Malotte, appeals to me more strongly than any other character in the cast. In Cherry, I believe Mr. Beach drew the most appealing, if not the central figure of his story. She is by far the most composite character, actuated both by good and evil, in strong surges that touch one's very soul. She is the one character among all of them whose soul bears her above her surroundings, though there is a palpable taint on her career. Miss Williams brings out finely the weak and strong points of her nature. Miss Bessie Eyton as Helen Chester, the leading part, contributes much to the success of the strong cast.

Stirring views in the production are the blowing up of the Midas mines, the terrific fight between Glenister and McNamara, the gambling and dance scenes in the music hall, the street duel and the realistic struggle between Helen Chester and Struve in the lonely roadside inn. Another scene that keeps one spellbound shows the Broncho Kid coming stealthily on Glenister to shoot him in the back, at Cherry's home, even still more thrilling than that other scene in the dance hall, where he is about to fire at the same man when prevented by his newly found sister, Helen Chester.

The Scene in the Bank, in "The Spoilers."

"The Spoilers" has been selected as the opening attraction of the new Strand Theater, New York City, about the middle of April. The nine reels comprise three acts and a prologue. The latter shows scenes which explain incidents that occurred before the Beach story opens, such as the departure of Glenister and Dextry for the States, Glenister's renunciation of Cherry and the Cabal at Washington, by McNamara and his accomplices, to rob the miners at Nome.

FAMOUS PLAYERS PRESENT MALCOLM WILLIAMS.

Malcolm Williams, one of the foremost character delineators of the American stage, will be presented by the Famous Players' Film Company in a production of "The Brute," by Frederic Arnold Kummer. "The Brute" is a tense, modern drama of the clash of wills between a strong man and a weak woman, the climax of which hangs in the balance until the man, in righteous indignation, exerts his full physical strength toward the subjugation of the woman, and through sheer force brings his willful and mercenary wife to see her folly and lovingly acknowledge her master. Mr. Williams, who plays the title role in the picture, was a leading factor in the great success of "The Typhoon," in which he gave a splendid portrayal of the artist.

"POP" LUBIN OFF FOR EUROPE.

Siegmund Lubin sailed on the Cunard liner, Lusitania, March 31st, for Europe. During his stay he will visit London, Paris, Berlin and a few of the smaller cities. The trip is a business one, as Mr. Lubin purposes to extend his trade on the continent, and especially to select a site for a studio in Paris. Mrs. Ira Lowry, his daughter, accompanies him on the trip.

GRANDON WAIVES CREDIT FOR "THE SPOILERS."

In ous issue of March 21 in an interview with Rex E. Beach, it was stated that Mr. Beach's story, "The Spoilers," was produced by F. J. Grandon. We are in receipt of a telegram from Mr. Grandon wherein he waives credit for making the picture and places it where it belongs, with Mr. Colin Campbell.

"The Life of Our Savior."

A Pathe Revival of the Passion Play by Pathe in a Seven-Part Production in Colors.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOR" is an enlarged edition of the Pathe Passion Play which sprang into fame and popularity just about six years ago. The Passion Play owed not a little of its long run to the excellent scenario upon which it was built. This scenario, carefully culling all the touching and beautiful points from the four evangelists, rivalled in its direct and dramatic simplicity the very style of the gospels themselves. In this new edition of the Passion Play the old scenario has been followed almost literally and I know of no higher commendation for these newer films.

The first part deals with the Birth of Christ just as in the old Passion Play. The progress, however, that has been made in extending the possibilities of the camera is apparent in much of the work and must be counted a distinct improvement. The second part is particularly fine. The Miracle at the wedding feast of Canaan is reminiscent in its sweetness and beauty of the best Christian painters and forms one of the artistic gems in the whole seven parts. The other parts follow the old scenario practically scene for scene, with the exception of the trial before Caiaphas and Pilate. Here I think the new edition shows a nearer approach to the historic realities than the old.

Another thing I like much better in the new edition is the representation of Jesus. In figure and in poise, in facial expression, in dignity joined to sweetness the Jesus in the new films meets the best traditions of Christian art; it is an idealization from which, however, the humanity of Jesus is never absent. There is, too, a most praiseworthy absence of even the trace of staginess. This Jesus in "The Life of Our Savior" approximates very closely the wonderful impersonation of Jesus in the unforgettable Ober-Ammergau Passion Play of 1900. The scene of Jesus driving the peddlers and the money-changers from the vestibules of the temple is at once impressive and dignified. The whip is rather a symbol of righteous anger than an instrument for punishing. In the old Passion Play the scene was somewhat marred by the lack of restraint in portraying the whipping part.

In other respects, however, the new edition falls below the old. Everybody admired and loved the Peter of the old Passion Play, at once intensely loyal and humanly weak. In the new films Peter is little more than a poorly animated lay-figure. A grave mistake was made in portraying Peter as a decrepit man of more than three score. Peter, when Jesus met him, was in the prime of manhood and beyond all doubt the liveliest, most active and most prominent of all the apostles. The other apostles, while conformable in appearance to the accepted traditions, were too much in the background. A notable instance of this strange error in direction I found in the scene in Gethsemane, in which, faithful to the gospel text, the old version gave due prominence to Peter, John and James. The scene in the Garden of Olives might easily have been rendered more dramatic and more impressive.

I cannot say too much by way of praise for the coloring of the pictures. We do not see many finely colored pictures these days and the sight of so much splendor and so much art was most pleasing to the eye.

As to the presentation of the pictures in the Manhattan Opera House, I do not see how it could have been worse. The projection was miserable. It took the operator something like an hour to get even a tolerable focus. Perhaps the screen was too large or the throw too far, whatever the excuse it cannot be accepted for a public performance. The music was little short of atrocious. For many centuries the Christian Church has accumulated special music for the religious calendar of the year. Greek Catholic, Roman Catholic and Protestant churches all unite in making all music connected with the birth and the childhood of Jesus glad and festive in tone. To play hymns like "Lead, Kindly Light" during the first part of the Life of Christ is unpardonable stupidity. There was neither system nor sense to this music and the total absence of the triumphant note in the resurrection and ascension was deplorable. There was a feeble attempt at a lecture. The speaker has a pleasant voice betraying a long ecclesiastical training and he is evidently a man of education, but the value of a lecture with motion pictures consists entirely of fitting the words to the action on the screen. In the Manhattan Opera House performance the lecturer was either far ahead of his picture, a way behind, and altogether too often his words had no relation whatever to what was happening on the screen.

Magnificent as this production is it needs proper presentation to give it its full charm and power.

Scenes from "The Life of Our Savior," Pathe Colored Production.

THE RELIGIOUS VALUE OF PATHE'S "LIFE OF OUR SAVIOR."

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton.

THE "Life of Our Savior," a seven-reel Pathe, which was at the Manhattan Opera House, New York City, last week, under the management of Mr. Robert W. Priest, in collaboration with the Rev. Richard M. Sherman, of the Educators' Film and Service Corporation, marks a distinct advance in the production of religious educational pictures of a similar character, though lesser in degree to what was accomplished by Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross." Any comparison between the two pictures would be invidious and unfair to both, because they represent two entirely different conceptions of Christ, which are in many ways diametrically opposed. The Kalem point of view is the Anglo-Saxon; the Pathe is the Oriental, the Hellenic, the Latin. One gives the Protestant conception of the man Jesus; the other, as its title indicates, portrays the character of the God-Man, Christ-Jesus, God, who for us men and for our salvation became man as well as God. The Kalem picture shows us the historic Christ, the man whose deeds are a matter of record and history in the four Gospels. The Pathe portrays the traditional Christ of theology, the Lord and Savior of mankind, whom Christians love and reverence and worship, and for whom they sacrifice themselves and die. For Bible classes, for instruction, for illustrating the text of the Gospels the Kalem picture is uniquely and eminently fitted; for missionary work, for inciting devotion, for kindling religious fervor, for rousing dormant and sleeping religious impulses and sensibilities, the Pathe picture is pre-eminent. It is one of the best purpose pictures that has yet been produced and in the hands of a good evangelist or parochial missioner can be used with telling effect.

Consequently, the Pathe picture is as full of the supernatural as the Kalem is lacking in it. The treatment of the supernatural by means of the barest suggestion rather than by representation is one of the great merits of the Kalem picture, because of its point of view and of its conception of Christ as mere man. The introduction of the supernatural was a necessity to the Pathe picture for the same reason, its point of view and its conception of Christ is supernatural. Pathe, however, had made no attempt to represent the actual supernatural events and incidents. It has simply represented them by certain conventional designs, recognized and accepted by the Church and theologians, some of them famous as Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" and the Raphael frieze of the adoring angels from the Vatican, and all of them well known to religious teachers and persons. At first sight these conventional representations may seem to some to be a blemish, but it must be remembered that any other kind of presentation would have been nothing more than the director's individual conception of something he never saw and could not possibly get first hand evidence about, and secondly that the use of the familiar although conventional designs is one of the things that makes the film most suitable for purpose and uplift work.

Those who are acquainted with scripture history and know their Bibles are accustomed to think of the worship of the shepherds and the adoration of the three wise men as two distinct and separate events, and know that the magi came from the east alone or with only a small retinue; but in the Pathe picture we have a vivid moving picture of the "bethlehems" which are found at Christmas time in many of the churches in this country and are practically a common household ornament in Europe. The effect of this in recalling to the minds of both old and young the religious teaching and training of their early days, is incalculable, and morally certain, even without the personal urging of an evangelist or missioner to bring some erring souls to repentance, and confession and amendment of life. The same is true of the other representations. St. Michael, with his halo and golden armor and flaming sword, might almost have stepped from his niche in the chancel of the cathedral of Cologne; the baptism of Christ in the river Jordan, His transfiguration on Mount Tabor, when "His raiment became white and glistering" and He talked with Moses and Elias about His coming death, the institution of the Last Supper or Blessed Sacrament, the descent from the cross, the burial, the resurrection and the Ascension have all been taken, not only as to scene, but also as to character and costume from famous and well-known paintings all of which have a deep, religious association in men's minds, and their reproduction here, with the additional force given them by the life and movement in the picture, cannot help but reawaken the religious convictions and sentiments with which they are originally connected.

The whole tone of the Pathe picture is reverent and devotional and the entire cast is deserving of commendation and thanks for the way in which they have portrayed their exceedingly difficult roles, particularly Madame Moreau as the Blessed Virgin Mary and Monsieur Normand as the Christ. In one or two places an Englishman or an American may be apt to think the acting is a trifle exaggerated or theatrical, but there is no action which is not perfectly natural to the more emotional and demonstrative Latin races, and it should be remembered that there are millions of persons in this country in whom runs the blood of the Ciceros and the Caesars to whom these very exaggerations will be but a more forceful appeal.

The picture is not, in the ordinary sense of the term, a feature film, and Mr. Priest and Mr. Sherman wish it to be distinctly understood that they desire to exhibit it "in a manner calculated not only to entertain, but to instruct and inspire reverence and conviction." To attain this object they are using every means at their command to obtain the co-operation of the ministers and religious workers in the various cities which they will visit, and they request, especially from the clergy, suggestions for improvement, commendation and criticism. If this method of exhibition is adhered to, the picture will be not only a success, but a blessing. It is a distinct step forward in the production of religious pictures, and when it can be obtained by religious workers for use in their special uplift work, it will undoubtedly do inestimable good.

LUCIUS J. HENDERSON.

ANNOUNCEMENT has been made by Herbert Payne, President of the California Motion Picture Corporation, that the services of Lucius J. Henderson have been engaged for the feature productions which that firm plans to place on the market at once.

Mr. Henderson has for years been prominent in theatrical and picture activities and he is recognized as a highly capable director. As in the cases of many other lights in the motion picture profession, he achieved fame as an actor and director on the legitimate stage long before motion pictures had won their place of prominence in the entertainment world. His popularity on the Pacific Coast is well established. He played the leading role in Edwin Milton Royle's "Wolf" at San Francisco's old California Theater in ninety-two, three and four. Mr. Henderson's success in it was equally as pronounced when it was taken east.

Lucius J. Henderson.

Henderson has also won fame as a playwright, his highest achievement in this respect probably being his collaboration on "The Strength of the Weak." His latter years on the legitimate stage were spent as leading man and director for Florence Roberts. His moving picture experience began with the Thanhouser Company shortly after that firm was organized. While there he directed many of the concern's feature productions, his list including such well-known photoplays as the adaptations from the operas "Tannhauser," "Lucile" and "Carmen."

Mr. Henderson's success with Thanhouser was responsible for his transfer to the Majestic Company at Los Angeles, when that firm was being reorganized. Among the plays that were produced under his immediate direction for Majestic are "Sappho," "Oath of O'Tsura San," "Ruy Blas" and "The Reform Candidate."

CHANGES IN EXCHANGE MANAGEMENT.

O. P. Hall, formerly manager of the World Film Corporation, Atlanta, Ga., has recently accepted a position as manager of the Southern Feature Film Corporation, of Atlanta. Mr. Hall is an experienced picture man, and has managed theaters in Jacksonville, Fla., and Atlanta for F. T. Montgomery. The vacancy created by Mr. Hall in the World Film Corporation has been filled by Wm. F. Niel. Mr. Niel knows the business thoroughly, and at one time controlled eight moving picture theaters in the South.

NORMAN MACDONALD MAKING CHANGE.

Norman MacDonald, for several years with Essanay, is at present at the Photoplayers' Club, Los Angeles. He has many successes in photoplay productions to his credit. Previous to his efforts in the picture field he was a prominent actor with leading companies in America and England. He is considering several offers, one of which is from a capitalist in Los Angeles for a series of four and five-reel classic features.

"The Blue Mouse."

A Six-Part Feature Offered by the De Luxe Attractions Film Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IT is no small praise to say of this production that it is deeply streaked with the same fine quality which characterized its forerunner, "Sealed Orders." "The Blue Mouse" is the first legitimate comedy in multiple reels. As it is entirely successful we must score another victory for the screen as a medium of expression. No severer test could be asked than a long comedy. A medium which will scatter the laughs in the audience for an hour and a half without one spoken word needs no further certification of dramatic power.

Much of this success is due to Madge Lessing. She still defies the withering stings of time and the staling thuds of custom. She is as fresh as ever and just as amusing. In "The Blue Mouse" she has found a medium for her peculiar skill and talent. Her coquetry is of the laughable and harmless order and her leading of silly old gentlemen into fools' paradises keeps us entertained from start to finish. We laugh at Madge Lessing and then we laugh with her and then we just laugh "regardless." She is such a funny and charming Blue Mouse, we are quite willing to forgive all her flirtations and lose sight of all but the humor of the thing.

There is no finer theme for laughter than the amorous fool, especially when that fool is passing rapidly into the sere and yellow. If Madge Lessing is a delightful Blue Mouse her chief victim is the most absurd and ludicrous hunter of the Blue Mouse variety. His part is played very ably indeed with all the care and discretion needful in the ticklish moments. Indeed all the artists in the cast are endowed with talents of a high order and there is not one who has not had the experience.

The situations in the play, which is no stranger here having had a long and successful run on Broadway, are truly amusing and neither the laughter nor the interest lags for even a moment. We are kept guessing, but never too long and the climaxes are plenty. At times the scream of the farce comedy rather than the smile of comedy a la Moliere will be heard in the audience, but this is no fault to worry over.

"The Price of Treachery."

The World Film Corporation Shows a Five-Part Drama Notable for Its Fine Photography.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IT is the quality of the photography that stands out the strongest in "The Price of Treachery," a five-part drama being released by the World Film Corporation. There are fine backgrounds—well-groomed lawns, great mansions, views of sea and shore—and it is the taste shown in the selection of these and the skill used in transferring them to the film that will make entertainment of the subject. The acting is good, in fact, of the best. The players make the most of a story that is notable neither for strength nor for celerity of action. While it is interesting there is absent the grip, the dramatic depth, that should exist in a feature, certainly in a five-part length. There are incidents that are out of the usual, as, for instance, the explosion of the dynamite on the wrecked schooner or the situation of the two sailors in the deck-washed craft just before the blowup.

Scene from "The Price of Treachery" (World Film Corp.).

The story concerns chiefly two brothers, one of them good and the other progressively bad. The former shoulders the blame for a crime committed by the latter and is turned out by the father. He goes to sea, in time becoming master of a vessel. In the vicinity of the old home there is a lighthouse, in which live the keeper and his daughter. Henry, the bad son, discovers Mary at about the time Robert, the sailor, back in familiar waters, also meets her. Henry is sheltered in the lighthouse when, out hunting with a party, a storm comes up. He abuses the hospitality; Mary fetches him a blow which knocks him down and injures the oil supply of the lamp so that the light is extinguished. In consequence Robert is wrecked, but is brought ashore by the old light keeper.

Henry, a month later, enlists the aid of friends in an effort to abduct Mary. He partially succeeds, but Robert, already engaged to Mary, pursues. The girl is taken away in a motorboat, by two of the party, Henry having fallen over a cliff and got separated from his companions. Mary by a ruse locks the two men in the cabin of the motorboat and turns the boat back to shore. Robert on shore follows the fleeing Henry, not discovering his identity until he overtakes him as he disappears in a bed of quicksand. All ends happily.

There are many things in the working out of this story deserving of praise. Among these are the interiors, which show care in the arrangement. The views of the lamphouse in the lighthouse are convincing—there is every reason to believe that the scenes were taken in an authentic spot.

"Memories That Haunt"

Two-Part Vitagraph Feature. Released Through General Film Company.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

ONE of those photodramas destined to win favor with moving picture audiences in all civilized countries, "Memories That Haunt" deals with a subject of wide contemporary interest in a story that holds. It holds of its intrinsic merits, its construction, its treatment and very largely because the two principals, Rose Tapley and Earle Williams, play their roles with a rare combination of strength and good taste. The action takes place in the disillusioned period of a young married couple of to-day and relates to a very common and very natural conflict of wills which almost inevitably occurs in that period.

The husband is an author, a man of deep natural affections though not demonstrative. In giving attention to his work, he is not only compelled to drive at it with unflagging zeal and determination, but to concentrate all the powers of his mind upon what he is doing, and this not only means hours of solitude, but unsocial habits as well. The wife is equally in love—she is proud of her husband's intellectuality and inclined to idealize him in a way that safeguards her fidelity, but her very fondness operates against their mutual happiness.

Her youth, the spirit of joy within her, calls for more of his companionship than the exactions of his profession will permit. There is no villainous tempter, no triangle, and no boisterous scene of misunderstanding, but there is a slow hardening of their relations that is bound to grow worse until it is dissolved in the acid of bitter experience. She decides to quit him at a moment when he is away and in conference with his publishers, and she leaves a note saying that she has gone to live with her father and mother, so that he may continue his selfishly absorbed career unmolested. His conduct on receiving this letter affords Earle Williams opportunity for a fascinating portrayal of suppressed emotion.

The husband neither weeps nor rants. He feels the rebuke keenly, and it affects him deeply, but he realizes that he can not work in any other way and that complete abandonment of his profession would be more disastrous than its continuance. He therefore accepts the situation. He realizes that he could not continue where there are so many warm associations, so many reminders of her who has beautified his life, so he decides to go on a voyage, makes his arrangements, including a parting note to his wife, and is ready to go. In a last moment of despondency, he places a great bouquet of flowers on his work table with his wife's photograph and slowly draws curtains over that phase of his existence.

We are now treated to the spectacular sinking of the steamer on which he has taken passage, with vivid scenes that give a powerful touch of realism to what follows. The author escapes on a piece of wreckage, is cast upon an island bearing a lighthouse and there slowly recovers, while his wife enters upon a chastening widowhood—his name being among those lost at sea. Rose Tapley's acting during her hours of character regeneration afford an unforgettable picture of what goes on in the human soul under pressure of lasting sorrow.

Especially pathetic is the wife's visit—she is in deep mourning—to the room where her husband worked. Her discovery of the combined intensity and delicacy of her husband's love purifies and beautifies her own. It also stirs her intelligence to a high point and leads to a happy, consistent conclusion.

"In the Hands of a Brute"

In a Good Three-Part Melodrama, Sid Olcott Incorporates Interesting Pictures of Logging Camps.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WRITING from the South recently the producer of the Sid Olcott International Productions said that in the work he was doing he was trying to combine the instructive with the dramatic. After viewing the three-part subject, "In the Hands of a Brute," which will be released through Warner's Features on April 13, it is plainly to be seen that Mr. Olcott has succeeded in doing that very thing. He has staged his picture in a Florida lumber camp. We see the trees cut down, we see the great logs hauled out of the forest, to the water's edge or to the side of the railroad; we see them yanked up on the flat cars like so many small sticks of wood, the employees recklessly boarding the moving train, and then we have a ride in to the mill on the top of the logs. To all intents and purposes it is the story of the play we are following; nevertheless we are shown pictures that will rank as educational, and with the dramatic interest enhanced.

The subject under review is the second release of Mr. Olcott, and in this as in the former the lead is taken by Miss Valentine Grant, a new player. Miss Grant here portrays Nell, a girl of the woods, an orphan, who waits on the table in the house where the camp laborers live. Nell is a mischievous young person, light-hearted when there is reasonable opportunity, yet serious and courageous, too, when the occasion demands. The work of Miss Grant in this picture whets the curiosity to see her in serious, dignified portrayal, in which we are bound to believe she will be successful. She has a charming personality, and she is of the fortunate age which enables her convincingly to play the schoolgirl or, as we see in the closing scene in this play, the demure young woman.

The story is of the escape of Nell from the clutches of a rough worker in the camp. In the first instance she had taken his whip from him and thrown it down the road. When Dalton went after the whip Nell had mounted the man's horse and rode home on it. When the enraged man comes to her door to complain to her employer he is greeted with a bucket of water. Walter Roberts, well played by James Vincent, a youngster just out of college, comes to work in his father's camp. We have seen him in school, drilling with the soldierly cadets of the University of Florida. We have seen him playing football, and we know he is husky. When the young timekeeper, whose identity has not been revealed to his fellow-workers, sees Dalton insult Nell following his ducking, there is the liveliest kind of a mix-up, in which Roberts wins out. When Nell misses the train out of the forest she is seized by Dalton, and in spite of her spunky resistance is carried to a negro preacher, who is compelled to read a marriage ceremony

When Nell's non-return is discovered, Roberts and some of his companions take the locomotive, go back and search for her. The trail is picked up and followed to the home of the preacher. Nell has executed a quick move and got possession of Dalton's pistol and is out of the house just as the posse arrives in sight. There is a thrilling pursuit, resulting in the capture of Dalton. There is a popular demand for a lynching bee, but it does not take place. When the parents of Roberts arrive in camp Nell is introduced to them, and Mr. Roberts arranges to send Nell to a seminary. Five years later there is a wedding.

The picture is well played, staged and photographed. It will interest all the way, and in the last half will thrill.

Vitagraph Company Not Exhibiting

Its Officers Declare They Will Acquire No Other Houses and Point Out How The Vitagraph Theater Benefits All Men Showing Vitagraph Pictures.

By George Blaisdell

IN a formal talk with a World man on Monday, two of the three owners of the Vitagraph Company of America discussed at length the questions involved in the project of the Vitagraph Theater, now in operation at 44th Street and Broadway. Contrary to what has been alleged in the press on one or two occasions, the statement is the first on this subject that has come from the company other than that contained in its advertisement, and it was intimated that unless the policy of the company should be changed undoubtedly it will be the last. Also, it was announced there will be no other Vitagraph theaters.

Messrs. J. Stuart Blackton and Albert E. Smith were talking in the executive offices of the Vitagraph. They said they doubted that there was any anxiety among exhibitors generally as to the influence the Vitagraph Theater would exert upon the exhibiting market—certainly so far as they had discovered in conversations with New York City picture men there was none; and if the exhibitors of the metropolis manifested no concern the officers of the company were skeptical as to the existence of any fear on the part of those in the country at large. It was, however, pointed out in convincing detail how the showing of Vitagraph films at the company's theater materially benefited all exhibitors handling the company's product. By the way, as Mr. Smith and Mr. Blackton were each speaking alternately, no attempt will be made by the writer to indicate the authority for any given statement, but it may be accepted as coming from the Vitagraph Company.

"The first thing I want to impress is," said Mr. Blackton in opening the conversation, "if any exhibitor would like to take upon his shoulders the loss of the Vitagraph Theater for a year we would be more than glad to turn it over to him and let him make the profit—if he can find it. We did not take the theater with any idea of profit in view. It was taken purely as an advertising proposition and in the hope that through it we could find a medium to give vent to ideas long under consideration—ideas that in the working out we believed would benefit not alone the exhibition of pictures, but the art as well—and thereby, of course, benefit ourselves and everyone in the industry. Now these big feature films cost us a great deal to make, and for them an exhibitor should, and can, get higher prices of admission, and he can run these features for more than one night.

Aims for One Dollar Seats.

"In this country we commenced the wrong way. We had the five-cent theater, then exhibitors raised their prices to 5 and 10 cents, in some exceptional cases to 25 cents, and more recently as high as 25 and 50 cents. Our idea has been to work the price up to one dollar. Now, abroad they began by charging higher prices than we did here. In Paris ten years ago we paid 3 francs, or 60 cents, for a seat, and prices are proportionately higher now. A letter just received from our Paris manager states that in some of the Russian cities he finds the cost of the best seats in a majority of the picture theaters from a dollar to a dollar and a half. In England the principal theaters charge as much as half a guinea. If we can raise the prices here the business will be on a higher plane, and the exhibitors and all concerned will be better satisfied. To put the matter in another way, we feel that with the Vitagraph Theater we are doing missionary work.

"In time to come more money will have to be charged for these big subjects. Take, for instance, a picture like 'The Wreck.' Now, that cost us a great deal. Notwithstanding its success in this country and even greater abroad, we did not break even. Had we possessed a theater in New York in which to show that production, where it might have been continued a few nights so that it might have been freely advertised to the exhibitors and the public, we could have got our money back. It was largely the loss we sustained on that picture that determined us to open the theater.

"We have been assured by numberless exhibitors that the exhibitor as a personage has made probably more money out of Vitagraph films than out of other makes. We want our customers to feel that this new move in the way of acquiring a theater is merely to foster this end: to enable them to make still more money out of Vitagraph films. While the exhibitors in all parts of the United States are our patrons, those of New York naturally are our nearest friends, and we rather feel the pulse of the exhibitor by the way our neighbors treat this particular question under discussion. A party of them came down here about a week after we opened the theater. We explained to them just exactly what we are now explaining in print. We told them we were going to have one house, and one only. It is true we have had various propositions made to us by men prominent in theatrical affairs, but our interests have always been with our old patrons and will continue to remain with them."

There is a distinct advantage sometimes in being a pioneer. It was said that the clippings received from papers all over the country proved the Vitagraph Theater to be practically as well known in the United States as is the Hippodrome. The novelty of the scheme had been responsible for an enormous amount of bona fide publicity. It will interest exhibitors to know that with the name of the theater has been coupled the titles of the plays that have been so successful at Broadway and 44th Street—"A Million Bid" and "Goodness, Gracious"—especially in view of the impending release of the two subjects through the General Film Company. "So you see," said one of our interviewees, which one we really forget, "the exhibitor will get the benefit of all the publicity these films have had through the medium of the press generally and the Vitagraph Theater specifically. It is for such reasons as this, for instance, we believe this enterprise will benefit the trade.

"While the release of these two subjects through the General Film means, of course, their withdrawal from our theater it is only fair to the pictures to point out that this action is not taken because they have ceased to be popular. We could run them there for a year. Also, we have other pictures we must put on. Our idea with all our big features is to run them for about four weeks, which we believe will give them a reasonable amount of advertising, so that the exhibitor will feel that these productions possess extraordinary merit."

Subjects Strengthened by Advance Showing.

The public showing for a long period by the maker of a production has had one result of importance and also marked a distinct advance in the motion picture art which may have escaped the attention of ordinarily thoughtful experts. Everbody knows that in putting on a stage production there is abundant opportunity during rehearsals for trimming and pruning, adding to and altering generally. These changes may continue in lessening degree for a week or a month after the initial production. Everybody also knows that when a picture is released it is irretrievably gone. It may be cut, but it cannot be changed—no matter how important the production. "In our Broadway house, with its long runs," said the Vitagraph spokesman, "we are enabled to improve our subjects the same as a theatrical producer may. We believe the two pictures now being shown are today at least 25 per cent. stronger than when they were first exhibited. We have put in and changed sub-titles and thereby materially enhanced the strength of the following scenes. In 'Goodness, Gracious' we cut out 200 feet and added one entire scene. We did that to make it a more perfect comedy film.

"One thing we have demonstrated by the theater which to me seems new is this: We put on subjects which were not of well-known plays and with a cast of actors and actresses who were not big stage stars, and we showed that a good picture with a real plot and a strong story acted by capable people who know this new art far better than many of those now being featured will stand, where the average so-called feature film with well-known theatrical names and even with well-known plays draws big audiences the first night and smaller ones each succeeding night. The feature film has come now to the point where it stands right on its merits, and no matter how big the poster or how wonderful the names of the actors and actresses on it if the goods are not there the thing will not last.

"In our own theater we are showing to a class of people who have never visited a moving picture house before—not alone New Yorkers, but hundreds and thousands of visitors from all parts of the country, who go home converts to pictures and give the benefit of their conversion to their local exhibitor.

"In order to avoid any possible misunderstanding it may be well for us to say there is one subject which was made in our studio that we do not absolutely control. That is 'The Christian.' Our contract with the Lieblers gives them the right to book it. There is no other Vitagraph film in that category.

"We have made this public statement to set at rest and to deny various reports. We just want to say in conclusion that, although we have been offered some of the biggest and most important circuits of theaters in which to show our product exclusively, we have always been in the producing business and furthermore we expect to stay in the producing business."

"The Sparrow"

In a Three-Part Drama the Leading Players' Film Corporation Features Madame Polaire.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Leading Players' Film Corporation will release in the middle of April a three-part subject in which will be featured Mme. Polaire, the well-known vaudeville artist. Mme. Polaire, it will be remembered, when she was in this country created something of a stir by advertising herself not as the most beautiful woman in the world but as exactly the reverse. As those who see the picture will agree, the statement was most unjust to herself. If she has a plain face surely it is a most expressive one. Certainly she herself would take exception to any remarks alleging shortcomings in her figure, of which in the circus scenes we see a great deal. The story has much of the atmosphere of the ring and of the show. The lead opposite to Mme. Polaire is feelingly played by M. Cesar, as Mafflu, a clown. Or, perhaps we should say, the leads opposite to the vaudeville artist, as Henry Roussel skillfully plays and has much to do as M. De Ganges, the mayor of the little town in which the play is located.

Mme. Polaire.

Mme. Polaire is not overfortunate in the story that plainly has been written around her personality. While it interests and will entertain there is an absence of deep dramatic quality. The picture is well staged and photographed, and there are charming exteriors and fine interiors. Of these latter the best are the views of the grounds about the home of the mayor, a great ivy-covered mansion, and of the luxurious furnishings. The circus ring is convincingly depicted and there is a large gathering of spectators.

Scene from "The Sparrow" (Leading Players).

The story is of a waif discovered in a field by Mafflu, who brings up the little girl and teaches her to become a circus performer. In after years when De Ganges, the mayor of the little town, witnesses the collapse of the performer, he takes charge of the underfed and abused girl and brings her into his home with the members of his family. Later "The Sparrow," as the girl has been known by her associates, falls in love with her benefactor. A visitor to the mayor falls in love with her. "The Sparrow" discovers the attachment between the mayor and his cousin and knows that her love is hopeless. She goes back to the circuc with her former protector. When, from the topmost trapeze she sees in the audience in the company of his bride the man she had loved, she falls from the bar and is mortally wounded.

This, of course, is the barest outline of the story. There are many good situations, such, for instance, as the escape of the Arabian steed and his capture by the guest of the mayor when the servants have failed to do so, thereby arousing the animosity of the groom and precipitating a fist fight between the man and the girl in the servants' hall. There is the struggle in the dressing-room of the performer and her strenuous admirer, the latter gaining admission through the agency of the discharged and grouchy groom, now employed in the circus. There are the comedy scenes when the circus girl is brought to the home of the mayor and for the first time in her life sleeps in a real bed and finds herself surrounded by the many feminine toilet accessories. There is a moment of pathos when the former circus performer, now arrayed in a fashionable gown, sees walking across the lawn the mayor and his fiance. Mme. Polaire is strong in the emotional situations.

SING SING CONDITIONS SHOCK MADAME BLACHÉ

Sits Calmly in the "Death-Chair," But Is Affected by the Cramped Cells.

MADAME ALICE BLACHÉ, the president and head producer of the Solax Motion Picture Company, has become an enthusiastic exponent of prison reform following a recent visit to Sing Sing, where she made an exhaustive study of that famous institution.

The preparation of a motion picture story for early production was the cause of Madame Blaché's visit and it was while making notes that would help her perfect the details of her picture drama, that she was made to realize the disgraceful manner in which the prisoners are forced to live.

She was invited to sit in the electric chair where 120 men and one woman met their deaths, but she was so affected by the thought of the horrible little cells with their narrow cots, that have to be folded against the wall to allow the prisoner even room enough to move, that she sat in the electric chair without a quiver and discussed the amazing condition of affairs in a great State like New York that could make such a disgrace as Sing Sing possible.

"I would not think that the electric chair would be dreaded very much by a prisoner who had suffered the tortures of the dark, damp, little cells he is forced to live in here," said Madame Blaché. It is exactly the opposite in the modern French institution of Frennes, where the large bright cells with rounded corners and ceilings to make dirt and dust impossible and the neat little beds and many conveniences cause the people laughingly to remark that it is a pleasure to be a prisoner in France."

Madame Blaché spent considerable time studying the Bertillion System and made pencil sketches of the different apparatus used in taking the measurements of prisoners.

ADOLPH ZUKOR RETURNS FROM LOS ANGELES.

After a month's absence from town, during which he visited the Los Angeles studios to confer with Edwin S. Porter on some big plans contemplated for his company, Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players, returned last Sunday to New York.

Among other subjects considered at this conference of the president and technical director of the Famous Players were the order of releases of the celebrated stage successes controlled by Charles Frohman and Henry W. Savage, Inc., secured by the Famous Players' recent alliance with those managers, the forthcoming trip to Europe with James K. Hackett for a production of "Monsieur Beaucaire" in the exact locality of the story, the erection and construction of the new studio in Long Island City exclusively for the production of the Charles Frohman plays, and many other matters that will soon evidence an important influence on the program of the Famous Players.

As is commonly known, Mr. Zukor was accompanied on this Western trip by Marcus Loew, Aaron Jones and Joseph Schenck, with whom he covered the Sullivan-Considine circuit of theaters, including thirty-seven houses from Chicago to Los Angeles, which the Loew Company has just secured by a purchase involving nearly $5,000,000. As a big stockholder in the Loew Theatrical Enterprises, this gigantic transaction incidentally commanded some of Mr. Zukor's attention on this recent trip.

CLOQUET, MINN., GETS $35,000 THEATER.

H. A. Sherman and D. F. Eselin, of Cloquet, Minn., are building a $35,000 moving picture and vaudeville theater in that city. It will be known as the Grand Theater and will have a seating capacity of 800. The plans call for an absolutely fireproof house, and it is to be opened June 10.

Daniel Frohman Talks Pictures.

In Interview by Colgate Baker for New York Review, He Says Maude Adams Will Appear in Celebrated Roles—Makes Other Interesting Statements Concerning Motion Picture Art.

WHEN Daniel Frohman writes or speaks for publication he always communicates something worth while. He was interviewed the other day for the New York Review, a theatrical publication, by Colgate Baker, and some very interesting statements were made by him. Introducing his subject by saying that when Mr. Frohman decided to enter the motion picture business some two years ago he was derided and pronounced a "dead one" by his long time theatrical associates, most of all by his brother Charles. "Today," says Mr. Baker, "Mr. Frohman has made a million dollars, more or less, in moving pictures and C. F. has at last been converted and gone over to the 'movies' with all his stars and theatrical properties."

Mr. Baker attributes to Mr. Frohman a thorough mastery of all the little tricks and turns of motion picture production and declares that he could go into any department and do the work himself, if necessary, and then, quoting Mr. Frohman, says:

"Although I am deeply interested in moving pictures and enjoy the work here very much, my heart is in the coffin there with Caesar—I am going to produce again for the legitimate stage when things get settled in the theatrical world," he confided.

"The development of the moving picture business and the popularity of feature films makes some people wonder whether there will be any regular legitimate stage in the future, I said."

"I am not worrying in the least about the drama. Pictures are doing the theatrical business good; they are eliminating the poor plays, relieving the oversupply of theaters and bringing out the best there is in drama. The effect of pictures on the theatrical business is as a whole most beneficial. The unfit will suffer, but it is the unfit which has hurt our theaters.

"As to the moving pictures replacing the drama, such an idea is preposterous. In drama there is always the magnetism of the actor, and his personal appeal. Moving pictures can never be as potent as the spoken drama, but they will always be great as a subsidiary art.

Predicted Present Conditions.

"About three to four years ago the congestion of theaters became very pronounced. I predicted at that time in an interview that rush of production of plays to fill these theaters, and the lack of material, would bring a crisis in the theatrical business, which came later. I made an arrangement with my brother, Charles, for the booking of the Lyceum Theater and this gave me the time to devote to other business activities.

"Then Mr. Adolph Zukor, who had made a great success with a number of small picture houses, came to me with a proposal to join him in the organization of the Famous Players' Film Company. Mr. Zukor had the idea that moving pictures might be greatly improved and that we might produce regular picture plays, and secure eminent actors to pose for the camera. His plan appealed to me; in fact, it struck me as a wonderful project, and after due consideration I joined him in the organization of the Famous Players' Company

"At that time moving pictures consisted of one-act releases, most of them being comic reels which were merely grotesque and trifling affairs. I argued that if the public liked these they would certainly like to see pictures of the famous dramas and the great actors of the world in their famous roles. It also occured to me that the improvement of moving pictures might be the solution of the big troubles of the theatrical business; too many theaters, high prices, and poor plays, and this has proven to be true.

Every One Protested.

"Prominent theatrical managers derided me somewhat for going into 'the movies,' but I did not mind it. My brother Charles was one of those who was most opposed to it and he made much fun of me. I could not induce him or Klaw and Erlanger to consider joining me in embarking in the picture business; in fact, they refused for a year to listen to me at all.

"Well, consider the situation to-day—Charles has become completely converted and has organized with us a company for the manufacture of films which will show all his great stars and plays. Klaw and Erlanger have likewise embarked extensively in the manufacture of pictures and so has nearly every other producing manager of prominence.

"However, they were all kind enough to give me a year of grace, and during that year we have established an immense manufacturing and distributing business all over the world. We have four big studios for the manufacture of films, one here in Twenty-third Street, one in Long Island, one in Los Angeles and one in London, while we have subagencies in every big city in the United States and Europe.

"The prominent theatrical managers who have entered the moving picture field have done splendid work. They have helped to justify our project, they have given the industry dignity and have encouraged high class work. The result is a general improvement in the class of productions.

"It is an established principle that the more good plays produced the more profitable the theatrical business becomes. Whereas the tendency towards indifferent and mediocre production has a discouraging effect on the public.

Believes in Competition.

"So we feel that the good work of our competitors in general is an aid to the entire industry. Artistic competition puts every film manufacturer on his mettle and brings about the best possible results in subjects and performances.

"There is no limit to the range of subjects for moving pictures or the scope of production. The development of the psychology of modern drama into a visualized form of action is a distinct art of its own which gives the creative director his great opportunities.

"Then, in another kind of picture, the massive spectacle, such as 'The Last Days of Pompeii' and 'Quo Vadis?', the creative director finds great faithfulness and sincerity from historical data and without regard to expense. They will last forever.

"The possibilities of the fiction novel in moving pictures are even greater than the drama. Drama is limited to only a few episodes, while the novel has the whole world and all history, past and present, to draw from. Consider the wonderful picture which has been made from 'Tess of the D'Urbevilles.' There is a real work of art with one of the world's greatest actresses, Mrs. Fiske, as the central figure. No one was more enthusiastic over 'Tess' than its author, Thomas Hardy, when he saw the picture in London.

"The creative director must elaborate many of the episodes of a play before he can use the camera on it. He must show more of the antecedent interest. Incidents which are only casually referred to in the dialogue must be visualized on more complete lines. Here is where the dramatic training of a director becomes invaluable."

"And are moving pictures of all the great novels likely to be made?"

"Most assuredly, every great fiction work will be the subject of a moving picture within the next few years, and splendid subjects they will make, too.

"This opens up a new field to our actors which they are glad to take advantage of. Today we have William Farnum in our studio posing for the pictures of 'The Redemption of David Corson,' made from the novel, not the play.

Maude Adams to Pose.

"Maude Adams is going to appear before the camera in her most celebrated roles, Lady Babbie and Peter Pan. Miss Adams was most difficult to induce to act for the movies.

"E. H. Sothern will also act for us before he retires.

"Among the eminent actors and actresses who have already acted for us are Mrs. Fiske, Mrs. Langtry, May Irwin, Bertha Kalich, Sarah Bernhardt, Cecilia Loftus, Florence Reed, James K. Hackett, James O'Neill, Cyril Scott, Arnold Daly, William Farnum, Jack Barrymore, Macklyn Arbuckle, H. B. Warner, Robert Warwick, William Courtleigh and Malcolm Williams. Then there is Mary Pickford, whose beauty and sweet personality have won world-wide fame on the film.

"All our leading actors are anxious to act for the camera today that their art may be handed down to posterity. I do not have to go after them any more, they are now coming to us."

"Do you think that acting for pictures is a good thing for the actor?"

"Certainly it is. James K. Hackett has demonstrated that acting for pictures is the best advertisement an actor can have and does more to build up a real following for him than anything else. This season on tour Mr. Hackett invariably did the greatest business in cities and towns where his moving pictures had been exribited. Sarah Bernhardt also found that pictures help business."

"How about the artistic end, do you think that picture work helps the legitimate actor in his art?"

Pictures Help Acting Art.

"Yes, I am convinced that it does—acting for the camera gives the actor the art of pantomime, it teaches him to express himself more in action."

"Do legitimate actors make the best moving picture actors?"

"Training on the stage is of the greatest value in acting for moving pictures, unless one has had it, consirerable preparation is required to act for the camera. It took Mrs. Fiske just ten minutes to completely master the technique of picture acting.

"You must remember that the moving picture stage is but twelve feet wide and the actor must do everything within this confined area that is done on a stage thirty or more feet wide. The restriction of acting space is the greatest difficulty that actors experience in picture acting.

"Writing for the movies also helps the playwright, it teaches him the value of action. You know I have always contended that conversation was the bane of drama. Every play has too much 'conversation' in it, and too little action, so moving pictures are excellent medicine for the dramatist."

British Notes

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

AFTER much twisting and twirling in the law courts and a chapter of correspondence in the press, a Danish dramatic picture bought up in this country by the Kinematograph Trading Company, has been satisfactorily christened. The trouble began a month or two ago when the English title of the film was announced as "Sealed Orders." Cecil Raleigh, the dramatist, has a play with the same name running in London and he objected, although the plot of the pictures differed from that of the play. After several weeks delay involving repeated reference to the matter in the Court, the case was compromised by the naming of the subject "Orders Under Seal." This subject has been booked at upwards of 300 theaters for first run, but the advertisement it has received has cost the company very heavy litigation expenses.

Roy Aitken is the visitor of the week to our metropolis and is making his temporary headquarters at the depot of the Western Import Company. Mr. Aitken has set renters talking enthusiastically over the forthcoming "Adventures of the 'Mutual' Girl," to be portrayed over a year. Apropos of "Mutual" matters their London agents have issued an official denial to a rumor rampant in the trade that D. W. Griffith was to sever his connection as producer to the corporation.

Ed. Durand, a photoplayer, who has won his spurs with Messrs. Pathe, is lying seriously injured in the Bingley Cottage Hospital. He was enacting a scene the other day swung from the jib of a crane overhanging a local quarry for the Capt. Cuttle Film Company, of Bradford. He was unable to retain a hold upon the chain and fell a distance of sixty feet.

Mr. Roach, the publicity manager of the Trans-Atlantic Film Company (Universal), will shortly hand over the reins of his office to Mr. H. Z. Levine, formerly of the Solax Company, in America. Mr. Levine is expected in London almost any day now and there can be little doubt that his unassuming nature will establish him a favorite in the British film world.

The recently established Neptune Film Company, the appearance of which I recorded a few weeks ago has commenced operations in film production upon a beautiful estate it has acquired in Hertfordshire. Mr. P. Nash, a former stage manager to the late Sir H. Irving, Sir H. Surely this is the last straw. After employing a baby nine days old in one of their dramas, the Hepworth Company recently added to its staff a veteran photoplayer aged 97.

O. A. C. LUND, PHOTOPLAY AUTHOR, DIRECTOR AND LEADING MAN.

OF those holding a prominent place in pictures to-day there are mighty few who successfully write, direct and play leads at the same time. O. A. C. Lund, for the past year affiliated with the Eclair, is one of the very few. And what is more, he stands at the top of his class. When one recalls such feature plays as "The Trail of the Hanging Rock," "The Devil Fox of the North," "The Greater Call," "The Beaten Path," and "When God Wills," every one of them unusually from a sales standpoint and otherwise one can better appreciate his worth in the motion picture industry. Mr. Lund wrote them and directed them and many more of equal success. Later successes have been "In the Toils of the Net." "When Pierre Met Pierrot," "The Wolf," and "Lady Lind."

O. A. C. Lund.

To say in which line—directing, writing or playing leads — Mr. Lund excells would be difficult. As a director he has perfected himself in every detail of the work through years of training and study. The same thing holds true relative to his writing. He has travelled the world over, has sailed as a cabin boy, before the mast, has studied in the capitals of Europe and he knows life in every phase; in writing his photoplays he draws on his wide experience and insight into human emotion. As an actor perhaps his success is considerably due to his natural ability in this direction. True, he has had much experience before the camera, but he is a great believer in instinct for such work.

Born in Stockholm, Sweden, he went through the public schools and graduated from the Upsala University. Soon after, he went down into Russia and became a newspaper correspondent. Then he moved over into Germany where he studied historical paintings and music. Following this, he was a globe trotter for years. Eleven years ago he came to this country, and soon followed in the footsteps of his father, who was a stage director. Before joining the Eclair he was in the film producing business for himself.

THE CHINA FAKIR GOES MERRILY ON.

El Paso, Texas, March 25, 1914.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: I noticed in your last issue that some exhibitor had been trimmed by a man calling himself E. A. Boehm and posing as a representative of the Royal China Company. This is probably the same man who worked me for $32.50. He gave the name of E. V. Wall and claimed to represent the National Importing Company, which really exists and does business in St. Louis. They disclaim any knowledge of him. He is a tall young German. He speaks English with a decided accent and has two stiff fingers on one hand and a big scar on one of his wrists. He claims to be a veteran of the Japanese-Russian war, the Boer conflict and the Spanish-American war. He says he is a soldier of fortune and is looking for another war. I think he will find it if any of his victims get hold of him and his order book showed a nice bunch of them, several of whom I know. The scheme is the same as outlined by "One of His Dupes for $30" on page 1666 of the March 28 World. We would like to have the chief of police here notified if he is caught in Texas and we will attend to the rest. ANOTHER VICTIM.

Fire Wrecks Edison Studio.

Big Edifice at Bedford Park, New York, Devastated by Flames—Players Save Much Valuable Property.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

AN early morning fire in the Edison Studio at Decatur Avenue and Oliver Place, Bedford Park, New York City, on Saturday, March 27, completely wrecked the main studio and caused considerable damage to the office section of the building. Fortunately many of the Edison players lived very near the studio and their timely assistance effected a large salvage in negatives and other photographic equipment that could not have been replaced if once destroyed. No estimate of the loss can be given at this writing, as it will take some time to clear away the wreck and inventory the damaged equipment.

It was six o'clock Saturday morning, when night watchman Daniel Clifford, in his office near the main entrance of the studio, detected an odor of smoke and began an investigation. He found the main studio, a lofty structure containing five stages, in flames. The fire had started below the switchboard and reached a property storage room in the basement filled with antique furniture and valuable objects of art used in stage settings. These made a hot fire and one that threatened swift destruction of the entire building and its contents. It found vent in the tremendous chamber and shot up through the glass roof into the air like a torch, and the fact that no breeze was blowing saved all the general offices containing records stored since the company started business. Except for a slight water damage the contents of the main offices were not greatly injured, but the projection room was ruined and the offices adjoining were put out of commission by flood and firemen's axes.

Clifford, the watchman, turned in an alarm and made a brave attempt to stay the progress of flames with fire extinguishers before the arrival of engines. A number of directors and actors living nearby came and carried all the films, negatives and positives to the house of William Bechtel directly across from the studio. Practically all the cameras, retorts, office books and important records were thus placed out of danger. The working force, comprising Mary Fuller, Gertrude McCoy, Miriam Nesbitt, Bliss Milford, Mrs. William Bechtel, Bessie Learn, Charles Seay, George Lessey, Marc MacDermott, Augustus Phillips, Ben Wilson, Duncan McRae, Robert Brower, William West and Barry O'Moore became veritable heroines and heroes in braving smoke and flames to save the company's property. The firemen arrived after all this work had been done and began the destruction of everything the members of the company had not saved.

The fire was confined to the main studio, but it was still raging when notice of it reached Manager H. G. Plimpton in his stateroom aboard the "Olympic," about to sail for Paris. Mr. Plimpton had barely time to get ashore. The last call had been sounded and the gangways hauled in, when a high-powered car from the studio arrived on Chelsea pier, and notice of the fire was sent to Mr. Plimpton. He and Mrs. Plimpton were lowered over the side of the "Olympic" just before the great vessel pulled out into the stream. He was carried in the car through the city to the burning studio, a distance of ten or more miles and immediately took charge of the situation. The magnificent system for which the Edison studio is justly famous became at once operative.

The manager's first move was to instill some of his characteristic self-control into the disorganized and distressed company. All of his luggage had gone abroad on the "Olympic," destined to reach Cherburg before it could be reclaimed, and he was under greater personal inconvenience than those who had lost a few of their effects in the fire. Mr. Plimpton then assigned specific duties to the various department heads, so that every office and store room was carefully guarded to minimize the loss.

At 10 o'clock, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Maxwell, vice-presidents of the company, arrived from Orange and the matter of finding temporary quarters was decided within an hour. Arrangements were made to carry on company production at the old Biograph studio on Fourteenth Street, and not only will the work proceed without delay, but the regularity of releases and delivery of films will suffer no interruption. Could insurance adjustments have been promptly made, work of production might have been started on two stages adjoining the main Edison studio within a few hours after the departure of the firemen.

"The Southerners," a three-reel feature, was in course of production, so far as studio work was concerned, under direction of Mr. Collins, the exteriors being formulated by Mr. Ridgely in Florida. The entire main studio was given up to one setting for the occasion, representing the forward end of Admiral Farragut's flagship, "Hartford," in collision with the Confederate ram, "Tennessee," the structure being designed to show Admiral Farragut in the rigging of the "Hartford" directing fleet action while exposed to the enemy's fire and to correspond to a famous painting, "The Battle of Mobile Bay." A picture of these studio ships would have made an interesting contribution to film lore if some camera man had been able to take it while the fire was in progress.

I received a letter Saturday morning from Mr. Frank Bannon asking me to communicate with him by phone as to whether I could view a three-reel feature, "Frederick the Great," at the studio that day. In spite of all the confusion during the progress of the fire, and in illustration of the system which prevailed, I was able to get in touch with him on the phone and arrange for a Monday appointment. On Monday, reconstructive work had progressed to such an extent that, weather favoring, studio work would have been going on to a limited degree. Order had been completely restored in the various offices, and there were very few signs of the great fire except disastrous evidence of its work in the main studio where the large iron girders had been bent and twisted, the glass roof broken and the basement strewn with the debris of valuable settings.

Contrary to all reports, the visualization of stories for Edison regular releases and features will continue at the Bedford Park studio. There is no intention of removing headquarters nor any part of the studio production to the works at Orange. From appearances, order will be so restored within the next two weeks that Mr. Plimpton may proceed on his trip to Europe.

S. M. BISHOP TO LOCATE IN LONDON.

S. M. Bishop has resigned as president of the American Kineto Corporation and will be leaving New York in a few weeks' time to take up the management of a business in London. Previously, he was connected with the Gaumont Company for nearly eleven years and served them in London, Paris, Canada and New York. In his new association he intends to keep in close touch with the trade in America and expects to have the pleasure of occasional visits to New York.

Mr. Bishop will be interested in American productions, and will be in a position to act as agent for any manufacturers requiring reliable and progressive European representation by one having intimate knowledge of the business and conditions on both sides of the Atlantic.

BILLY GARWOOD JOINS "FLYING A."

Word comes from Santa Barbara, Cal., that Samuel S. Hutchinson, President of the American Film Manufacturing Company, has engaged Billy Garwood as leading man to replace Sydney Ayres. Mr. Ayres becomes producer of the "Flying A" company in which he formerly played the lead, succeeding Lorimer Johnston, resigned.

Mr. Garwood will play opposite Miss Vivian Rich. His histrionic ability is a matter of record in the annals of motography and his many friends will be delighted to see him in the new environment.

Arthur Roussel

Interesting Sketch of the Motion Picture Career of the Head of the Eclectic Company.

MR. ARTHUR ROUSSEL, at present the general agent of the Eclectic Film Company, first started in the motion picture business as a boy with M. De Bedts in 1896 in Paris. Mr. De Bedts was one of the pioneer producers and manufacturers, and at the time that Mr. Roussel went with him, twenty-five feet of film taken at a street corner was considered the maximum length and was accepted as a great novelty in all the theaters. Mr. Roussel there got his grounding in the technical and mechanical end of the moving picture business. The methods were very crude and the production was not very large, and the future of the business seemed so uncertain that he left it to go into the manufacture of picture post cards and photo advertising.

Mr. Arthur Roussel.

In 1906 the moving picture business again attracted him, and he went with Pathe Freres, in Paris, in charge of the coloring department. At the time he went with Pathe all coloring was done by hand, but a very crude machine had just been introduced with which they were experimenting. Mr. Roussel perfected this machine to such an extent that he changed the production from a maximum of less than ten thousand feet per day to about one hundred thousand feet per day, and completely eliminated the hand coloring of the films.

When Pathe built a new factory in Vincennes, Mr. Roussel was placed in complete charge of the manufacturing, including the developing, printing and mounting. Here, he inaugurated several changes, notably in the method of washing the films, cutting down the time necessary from about an hour and a half to twenty minutes. This effected a great saving in time and enormously increased the output. When Pathe decided to open an American factory in 1907, Mr. Roussel was sent to America to build, equip and organize the plant in Bound Brook, N. J. Although handicapped by a total lack of English, he built and equipped the factory so it was a model for today. He remained in charge of the factory organization for about three years, when he was given control of the studio organization also. This placed him in charge both of the manufacturing and the production ends, making him completely familiar with the moving picture business from beginning to end.

He was sent back to France to install and organize a new plant for Pathe Freres which was specially designed to manufacture and produce films suitable for the home projecting machines. This was an enormous task as anyone who has any knowledge of the home field knows. While here he installed and perfected a machine for developing the films so that hand work was entirely eliminated.

His experience while in America had opened his eyes to the great possibilities there were in the distributing end of the business, and he left Pathe Freres to come to America, where he organized the Eclectic Film Company, distributing feature films. Arrangements were made with the biggest producers in all European countries whereby the Eclectic company was able to choose any features which it felt would appeal to American audiences, and have the sole right to distribute these in America. The Eclectic Company started in a small way, but Mr. Roussel was always looking for some opportunity to make the Eclectic Film Company one of, if not the greatest distributing houses.

Owing to his complete knowledge of both the producing and the manufacturing ends, he planned the "Perils of Pauline" and made arrangements with the Hearst newspapers and the Hearst Syndicate to run this great feature as a serial in their full chain of papers. He made special arrangements with Pathe Freres to lease some of their stars and one of their studios in which to produce the play. He guided the production, at the same time looked ahead, and made arrangements for the distribution.

The "Perils of Pauline" was expected to be a big success, but, no sooner was it announced than inquiries began pouring in from all over the country. This made it necessary to open eleven new branch exchanges in less than two weeks. The proper men were found to take charge of these exchanges and the result has been that the Eclectic Film Company are today putting out more original prints of the "Perils of Pauline" than have ever been put out before by any feature production.

Mr. Roussel is well known in America, and in Europe is regarded as not only an expert, but his word is taken as final in the manufacturing and producing of moving pictures.

SHUBERT TO BOOK PICTURES.

New Company Formed with Joseph L. Rhinock as President Will Control Long List of Dramatic and Musical Plays.

Announcement is made by the Shubert theatrical interests that a new company has been formed to be known as the Shubert Feature Film Booking Company for the purpose of booking motion pictures to be made from a long list of dramatic and musical comedy productions controlled by the Shuberts, W. A. Brady and other dramatic managers. The total number of plays thus made available for picture production approximates about two hundred, many of which are noted successes.

Joseph L. Rhinock is president of the new corporation, Jules Murray, manager, and Lou Weed the booking agent. J. E. Brulature and Ch. Jourjon, of the Eclair Company, are said to be interested in the enterprise.

Work on productions for the new booking agency is now under way at the Eclair studio at Fort Lee and, unfortunately, some of the negatives were destroyed in the fire that burned the Eclair factory two weeks ago. But the plans for the new Eclair factory and studio are designed to take care of the large enterprise contemplated by the organization of the Shubert Feature Film Booking Company.

"FLYING A" NOVELTY BALL.

On Tuesday, March 17, 1914, the employees of the American Film Manufacturing Company gave their first novelty dance at the Colonial Ball Room, Chicago. About one hundred and sixty couples were present and all had a most enjoyable time. The hall was artistically decorated with American flags and festooning furnishing a beautiful setting for the rich gowns and costumes worn by the ladies.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE FOR ZANESVILLE, OHIO.

A new company composed of Zanesville, Ohio, business men will be incorporated to the extent of $20,000 to build and manage a moving picture theater in Main Street, between Fifth and Sixth Streets, that city. The name of the proposed house is the Imperial, and it will have dimensions of 45 by 100 feet, with a seating capacity of 600. A. C. White is scheduled to manage the new house.

Doings at Los Angeles

GEORGE HOLT, the Vitagraph heavy man and character player, was presented with a bouncing baby boy at his Santa Monica home on the 19th. The mother and young actor were doing nicely, but poor George was out in the hills doing a big war scene and as so many extras had been engaged he was obliged to go ahead and play his part while his first born went without his fondling.

Frank Cooley is rapidly rising. He is now playing character parts and is helping Harry Pollard in the production of Beauty films at Santa Barbara.

Miss Edith Storey, the star player for Vitagraph, who was here on a trip for the purpose of playing the lead in a five-reel South American war drama, has returned to New York. She left on Thursday, March 19, in company with her mother. The members of the Santa Monica company gave her a delightful farewell party in the dancing palace. Afterward the filmers adjourned to the "Breakers" cafe where a beautifully decorated table greeted the Easterner. The name of the company was done in smilax, studded with daisies and numberless carnations adding beauty to the effect. All the flowers were picked the same day out in the open. A small train with pennants bearing "Brooklyn Bound" flew from the parlor car.

Charles Giblyn, who has been directing at the Santa Monica Broncho camp, in the canyon, has severed connections with that brand and will probably be with the Famous Players Company, at Hollywood.

George Cooper, the heavy "crook" lead for Vitagraph, at Santa Monica, has cut his ties with the local company and has been on a two-weeks' vacation. He lives in a bungalow on the beach and swims daily in the surf. He has closed with the Universal and will be in Gold Seal films.

Reeves Eason, assistant director of Santa Barbara American, has taken unto himself a bride. Miss Jimsy Perkins is the Miss who has decided to enter the film game. They were married on March 19. The couple met only last January, when the bride was visiting the studio, and it is only March now.

A Pathe cameraman, together with a bunch of Los Angeles men traveling in deep snow and slush, made six miles in half as many days going from Baldwin's Lake to Bear Valley. The auto was stuck and mules were used to pull it out. The tables turned and the mules became mired and the machine pulled them out. No company players are traveling to this snowy location for the roads are closed now. In the summer time this is an ideal location.

Fifteen thousand feet of film will be taken of the beauties of California, to be shown during the big 1915 exposition. Every part of the Southland will be photographed for the visitors to see.

The Santa Monica Kalem Company has closed shop. Everyone has folded up their tents and trecked to other climes. Hal Clements, the director, will probably join a local company as soon as he finishes with the studio here. Billie Rhodes, the girl who played leads, will entertain in a Los Angeles cabaret. Jack Phipps, the young man who played leads, will join a company in the city, while the rest of the players will join other forces. The closing of the studio came as a surprise. Clements had just completed extensive improvements and the studio was one of the best on the Coast. He was given a farewell dinner by the company on the 18th in "Sunset Inn."

One hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars was the total damage done by rains last month to roads in the mountainous country near here. The many companies suffered losses in this flood, the Universal probably being the heaviest loser.

Many people passing along near the car tracks the other day were looking for the cameraman, for they saw a big tall man clad in pajamas and swinging along with a blanket over his shoulders. He attracted so much attention and people thought it was movies. He was a "bug" from the county hospital who thought himself a Redskin. The incident created much amusement when the police came.

Frank Dale, of Pasadena, will soon build a $60,000 motion picture play house on one of the principal streets there. The building will be of reinforced concrete and brick. This will be one of the finest in the South.

Word has been received that Will H. Lynch, who is making films for the Asaitic, at Shanghai, China, has gone on a six months' trip into the interior. He will get films showing the inland cliff dwellers and glimpses of the Yang Tse river and gorges.

W. H. McCarty and others have incorporated a concern which will be known as the Advance Motion Picture Corporation. They incorporated for $25,000.

On St. Patrick's Day, J. Barney Sherry, the "Irish Prince," could not let the day flee without some jollification. He entertained a number of friends at his Santa Monica Bay home. Everything was appropriately decorated. Green was everywhere, and nifty place cards greeted the diners. All had a most enjoyable time. The guests were mostly film folk friends of the genial J. B.

Mona Darkfeather has ordered delivered to her Kalem rendezvous a wonderful white limousine which she will learn to run herself. The car is said to be one of the most elegant in Los Angeles.

While Francis Ford, and the company, with Grace Cunard were in San Diego doing some airship scenes for the Lucille Love series, one of the dependents of Ford was injured. Ernest W. Field was the man who fell twenty-five feet on the rocks down the coast. His skull was nearly fractured and he suffered a severe shaking up.

Robert Leonard and Hazel Buckham, of the Nestor, are now being directed by Lloyd Ingraham, formerly with Essanay, at the Universal studios. He was at one time a legitimate actor, and was quite well known.

Billy Garwood is on his way to Santa Barbara to open on March 23d with the American. He closed with Majestic this week.

Adele Lane is soon to be featured in a Selig series of big film plays. She has shown very emotional work, and has become such a strong favorite at the studio that it was decided to feature her. She is a strong and forceful actress.

The Photoplay Authors' League has been formally organized. At the meeting Frank E. Woods was elected president; Marc Edmund Jones, secretary; Richard Willis, treasurer; Hetty Grey Baker, Russell E. Smith, W. E. Wing and F. M. Willis, board of control. The league will incorporate and design a seal which will be used on all scripts turned out by members. There will be two classes of members, active and associate. The first will pay ten dollars per annum and must show ten produced scenarios, while the associate members will pay five dollars a year and have five scenarios to their credit on the screen. Those who were present or who said they would join, besides the above mentioned, were: Mary H. O'Connor, D. W. Griffith, George Hennessey, Clarence G. Badger, Theodosia and Adele Harris, Clifford Howard, Eddie Dillon, Anita Loos, W. C. Cabanne, James Kirkwood, Lois Weber, James Dayton, Augusta Phillips Fahrney, Francis Ford and Grace Cunard. The idea of the league is to protect the real script writer, and to work improvement in the market conditions as well as work for legislation.

Sturgeon's Vitagraph army of South American soldiers was near breaking up on the night of March 20, for a number of the braves were arrested and held in jail on charges of crap shooting. Sturgeon went to the police station and held council with the judge, and the result was that the soldiers were fined $100 each, and allowed to go back to work. Sturgeon was pretty nervous for a while, as he had engaged hundreds of extras for Saturday's big war scene. He finishes "Captan Alvarez" this week. It is in five reels.

Rollin S. Sturgeon is nearly done with "Captain Alvarez," the five-reel South American feature film in which Edith Storey is playing the lead. Sturgeon is technically away from Vitagraph, but owing to this big picture will be at the studio for a week or more. He will take a vacation as soon as the film is finished. He has sold his theater here, but still retains his pretty beach bungalow, which is located in the Palisades district of Santa Monica. This week he is using the largest number of extras ever hired for a single picture. They are warriors in the battle scenes, which are supposed to be in the heart of South America. One interior set which has been used in this picture has been up for nearly two weeks, the lengthy scenes necessitating much rehearsal.

CLARKE IRVINE.

THIS IS ONE THE CAMERAMAN LOST.

During the recent blizzard which tied up all railroad traffic between New York and Philadelphia, Miss Justina Huff, leading lady of Joe Smiley's Lubin Company, was one of those caught about fifteen miles outside of Trenton. She was stormbound for twenty-four hours, the car was cold and there was very little food, but through it all she never lost her sweet Southern smile. During lapses of conversation she entertained her friends and the passengers with many darkey stories. One of the best is this: "There was a laundry in Savannah which advertised in the local newspapers, 'Rare Work on Shirts.' When one of the master's shirts was returned soiled he instructed the darkey to take it back and have it done over. When the darkey arrived at the laundry office he made the remark, 'Massa says dat if dis shirt is wot you calls rare work on shirts, he wants his well done.'"

The National Censorship Bill.

Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, Offers a Bill to Establish a Federal Motion Picture Commission.

THROUGH the courtesy of Secretary Fulton Brylawski of the Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia, THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is able to present the full text of the bill introduced in the United States Senate on March 18th, by Senator Hoke Smith of Georgia. It is known as Senate Bill 4,941, and was advanced to the second reading and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. A similar bill has been introduced in the House and is known as the Hughes bill. In brief, the measures provide that a Federal Motion Picture Commission of five persons shall be appointed by the President of the United States to hold office for six years at salaries of $3,500 for the chairman and $3,000 for the other commissioners, and with power to appoint deputies and other assistants.

The commission is empowered to license films intended for interstate commerce and to bar objectionable pictures. A fee of $3 per 1,000 feet is to be charged to the manufacturer for the examination. A certificate is to be attached to each reel of film, and it shall be unlawful to distribute films not so certified.

Inasmuch as a law exists that prohibits the distribution through the channels of interstate commerce of motion pictures of prize-fights it is believed by those who are urging the passage of this measure that it will be effective if enacted. The full text follows:

A bill to establish an official censorship of motion pictures in interstate and foreign commerce and in the District of Columbia and the Territories and all other places under national jurisdiction:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a Federal Motion Picture Commission is hereby created, to be a part of the United States Bureau of Education and to be composed of five commissioners appointed by the President, not more than three of whom shall be of the same political party.

SEC. 2. That no commissioner shall hold any other office or position under the United States Government. Each commissioner shall hold office for six years, except that when the commission is first constituted two commissioners shall be appointed for two years, two for four years, and one for six years. Actual and necessary traveling expenses shall be allowed to those who travel on the business of the commission, which shall be provided with necessary office furniture, stationery, supplies, projecting machines, and appliances necessary for inspection of films and for manufacture of film seals.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall license every film submitted to it and intended for entrance into interstate commerce unless it finds that such film is obscene, indecent, immoral, or depicts a bull-fight or a prize-fight, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt the morals of children or adults or incite to crime. The commission may license any film, subject to such excisions, amplifications, or alterations as the commission may direct and require to be made. The commission may, by unanimous vote, withdraw any license at any time for cause shown.

SEC. 5. That the commission may appoint advisory commissioners to advise and assist in the examination and censoring of films, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the commission and serve without compensation. No person shall be appointed an advisory commissioner who, directly or indirectly, has any pecuniary interest in the exhibition of motion pictures, or in any film exchange, or firm or corporation engaged in manufacturing motion picture films.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall adopt an appropriate seal, which shall be affixed in such manner as the commission may direct to every film approved by it. Such seal shall not be attached to any film which has been approved by the commission subject to revision until after the required changes have been made, a record of which shall be kept, and portions objected to shall be delivered into the possession of the commission.

SEC. 7. That when any film has been approved, the commission shall issue a certificate in the form adopted by the commission. Each certificate shall describe the film and shall bear a serial number and shall state its title and description and the day upon which it was approved by the commission, and the number of linear feet contained therein. No copyright shall be issued for any film which has not previously received the certificate and seal of this commission.

SEC. 8. That the commission may, if it has licensed a film issue a seal and certificate for each duplicate thereof without an examination of such duplicate.

SEC. 11. That in places designated in section ten the seal of the commission attached to the film shall be exhibited on the screen before and in the same manner as such film is exhibited, and the certificate granted for a film shall be posted at or near the entrance to the place where such film is being exhibited during the exhibition thereof.

SEC. 12. That the fee for the examination of each film of one thousand feet or less shall be $3. These fees shall be paid monthly into the United States Treasury.

SEC. 13. That any change or alteration in any picture on the film after it has been licensed shall be a violation of this Act, and shall also void the certificate and seal issued for or attached to such film, and it shall be unlawful to exhibit it as aforesaid or transport it in interstate commerce.

SEC. 14. That the commission shall annually, on or before the first day of January in each year, submit a written report to the United States Commissioner of Education. SEC. 17. That this Act shall take effect immediately, except sections nine, ten, and eleven, which shall take effect nine months from date of the approval of this Act.

A NEW FILM ORGANIZATION.

The Excelsior Company Building a Studio at Lake Placid in Which It Will Make Multiple-Reel Pictures.

THE latest aspirant for honors in the film industry is the Excelsior Feature Film Company, Incorporated, capitalized at $75,000. Harry Handworth, a well-known Pathe producer, is the president. William A. Williams, a former Pathe player, is the vice-president. William H. Wright is the treasurer and Shirley S. Lloyd is the secretary. The address of the latter two is 105 West Fortieth Street. Mr. Handworth will be the producer and the leads will be played by Octavia Handworth and Mr. Williams. The company has leased, with an option for purchasing, the same property as was used last year by the Adirondack Pathe organization—the Stevens estate, on the shore of Lake Placid. There is now being constructed a studio of glass and steel. It is intended to make pictures here the year around.

The plot is 200 feet square and is situated right on the lake. Mr. Wright said the other day that the company is spending a lot of money to bring the equipment right up to date. Cooper-Hewitt lamps are being installed. Already on the property are two boat houses, a naphtha launch accommodating twenty-four persons, and a residence containing eleven sleeping rooms.

"We have given our company the name of Excelsior," said Mr. Wright, "and we intend to live up to it. We are going into this business as an investment, and we realize it is necessary in these days in order to be successful that we make good pictures. Just what method we will adopt in marketing our product has not yet been definitely determined. We expect to be all ready for the beginning of work May 1, and it will not be long after the first of June when our first subject will be ready for public viewing. We have declined several offers of additional money, preferring to restrict our list of stockholders to the present five.

THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

The interest of William Georgion and Mrs. Lersch in the Arris Theater, 5 North Main Street, Mansfield, Ohio, has recently been purchased by H. W. Thomas, of Washington, D. C.; C. C. Beck, one of the original members of the amusement company, still retains his interest. The house will be under the management of Mr. Thomas, who is experienced.

The Picture in Education

Mrs. Katherine F. Carter, for Two Years with the General Film, Resigns and May Take Up Independent Work.

MRS. KATHERINE F. CARTER, who for the past two years has filled responsible positions in the executive offices of the General Film Company, has resigned. Mrs. Carter's last work with that company was at the head of the educational and entertainment department, to which place she was promoted on the death of Mrs. Dolese. Mrs. Carter extended and expanded the scope of the department, and brought it to a state of great efficiency. She brought to her task an ideal equipment, having had not only an all-around business training but also an experience of five years as a school teacher and lecturer. In conjunction with these exceptional preliminary qualifications for carrying out her new duties, Mrs. Carter was advantaged in the possession of an engaging magnetic personality, an alert mind that enabled her to grasp details with facility, and an enthusiasm that inspired confidence as it carried conviction. So it was the natural thing that she should be successful in building up for educational and entertainment subjects a wealthy and exclusive clientele in New York City and its vicinity.

While Mrs. Carter has received offers from three manufacturers, to each of which she is giving serious consideration, she is strongly inclined to enter business on her own account, believing that in this way she will be freer to put into execution plans she has long had in contemplation. Her close and sympathetic study of the requirements of the educational field for motion picture aids, her knowledge of the institutions that have already actively entered upon the use of kinematography in their curriculums, and her acquaintance among men and women who are giving of their time and energy to extend the adoption of the motion picture as an aid to education lead her to the belief that there is a big field for her in individual effort. So it is not without the bounds of probability that there may soon be an announcement of a developments in the popularizing of motion pictures that will be as interesting as it is important.

The Bell & Howell Company

New Offices and Factory Recently Built on Larchmont Ave. Will Be Occupied About May 1.

THE Bell & Howell Company has just completed the construction of a new building at 1803-11 Larchmont Avenue, this city, which will be occupied as an office and factory about May 1. The ground space can be doubled in the future, if necessary, and the present structure is built so as to carry an additional story. Behind this simple announcement are facts of interest that will appeal to all who are in any way concerned with the moving picture business.

Organized some seven years ago, this company, at the earnest solicitation of film manufacturers, entered the moving picture field with a film perforator. This machine has set new standards of precision, accuracy and speed in film perforation. As a consequence Bell & Howell film perforators are used by nearly every manufacturer of film and maker of moving pictures in the United States.

The perforator was soon followed by a continuous feed film printer and that in turn by a cinematograph camera designed primarily for studio use. While the early sales of these two machines were helped by the reputation gained by the perforator, they quickly established themselves as superior instruments of their kind. The demand for all three of the machines has been growing steadily, and during the past year it far outstripped the factory facilities.

The company expected to lease additional space in the building they now occupy at 217 West Illinois Street, beginning with 1913, but were unable to do so, and hence decided to build for themselves. A site was purchased on Larchmont Avenue and the new building, already referred to, will provide nearly three times the space available at the present location. It is modern in all its appointments, and is being equipped with the new machines and tools necessary to enable the company to increase its output.

The Bell & Howell Company has been urged to bring out certain new machines, and in partial response to this demand they will, within a short time, offer a step feed film printer which they are confident will meet with the same reception which has been accorded to the machines they are now building.

The company is closely in touch with developments in the moving picture field and is constantly studying the needs in that field, in order that it may better serve those who are in any way engaged in the making or use of moving pictures. The company has been particularly impressed with the great loss, annoyance and confusion arising from failure to standardize the work done by moving picture film perforators, printers and cameras, and has adopted a definite standard of film perforation for use in the construction of its machines. The adoption of this standard has enabled the company to make precision and uniformity in perforating—and in the manufacture of printer and camera sprockets—characteristic of the hundreds of machines it has built and sold. Meantime, the company has lost no opportunity to urge that all moving picture machinery should be so built as to conform to certain universal standards.

The Bell & Howell Company has issued handsome booklets of 12 pages, quarto size, on their printers, cameras and perforators, a booklet being devoted to each machine. These booklets have beautiful illustrations showing various views of each machine. Everyone interested should have these valuable booklets on file.

On Saturday, March 14th, the company gave a reception to its employees and their families. The occasion was most enjoyable and about 250 people participated in the festivities.

FIRE IN KEYSTONE LABORATORY.

A fierce fire broke out March 13th in the Keystone laboratory at Los Angeles, Cal., and did considerable damage before the flames could be extinguished. Two printing machines were ruined, besides two finished pictures that were made at the Santa Monica Broncho Studio. Bert Hunn distinguished himself in fighting the fire. Manager Brandt, of the film department, was severely burned about the hands while fighting the fire. Much valuable film was saved.

PLANS CALL FOR BIG THEATER.

A. C. Morrison, proprietor of the Princess Theater, 58 State Street, Hartford, Conn., has taken a ten-year lease on the new theater to be built on the site of the old Auditorium Building in Asylum Street (that city), which was destroyed by fire recently. The plans call for an absolutely fireproof house with a seating capacity of 1,700. Mr. Morrison expects to have the house ready for opening October 1, 1914. He proposes to make it an exclusive picture house with multiple reels constituting the programs.

A Comedy Filmlet.

Wm. N. Selig, Harry Lauder, Wm. Morris and Others Act Before the Camera.

A FEW months ago when Harry Lauder was taking his talking pictures out at the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company, a rare something not down on the schedule of the day's proceedings was humorously and successfully brought off. This something was nothing more or less than a comical skit, extemporized on the spot, in which Harry Lauder and Wm. N. Selig took the principal parts.

H. W. Selig is seen entering a bank and coming out with a sack of money. Harry Lauder accosts him as he comes out of the bank, and offers to flip a coin for the amount in the sack. Bill Selig is game and consents. Harry gets the money. Then Mr. Selig pulls out a thick roll of bills and they toss the coin again. Harry again wins, and Bill lands a telling blow on his wind. The police rush in as the gamblers clinch wickedly and place both men under arrest.

The filmlet is about 300 feet in length, and the date of its release is very indefinite. Participants in the cast are shown in the accompanying cut. While Col. Selig, who appears in the picture, has been a photographer in other days, he has always been camera shy himself. It has always been a difficult thing to get a photographic likeneess of him, but whoever got him this time got him right.

STOLEN FILMS.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: We have just been advised by our Mr. Sam Lichter, manager at Cleveland, that a copy of "Man in the White Cloak" (Great Northern Special in 3 parts) was stolen while in possession of the Amphion Theater, who were returning it to the office. A reward of $20 will be paid for information leading to the arrest of the party or parties. Wire information to Liberty Film Renting Company, 306 Columbia Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

Yours truly,
LIBERTY FILM RENTING COMPANY.

TOWANDA, PA., GETS NEW HOUSE.

The Majestic is the name of the new theater to be opened by William L. Woodin in Towanda, Pa. It is a six-hundred-seat house, and plays moving pictures and vaudeville. The house is equipped with a stage measuring 17½ by 35 feet, and the proscenium opening is 14 by 17½ feet. Mr. Woodin has been in the moving picture business for ten years, and was formerly the manager and proprietor of the Euclid Theater in Sch-Haven, Pa.; the Lyceum in Montgomery, Pa., and the Orpheum at Orwigsburg, Pa.

Moving Picture Educator

A LONELY SCHOOL-MASTER.

THAT Colorado school-master who recently read a paper before a school convention is a most unique person. During the last few years the writer has read thousands of newspaper extracts from all parts of the world, recording the warm appreciation of the moving picture in all classes of educational circles. From this Colorado teacher comes the first discordant note, and his plaintive wail is worthy of analysis because of the shallowness and pitiable poverty into which this unfortunate individual is wallowing. Under the title of "Theories and Facts," the Moving Picture World in a recent issue dealt very ably with one phase of this matter.

The "Educator," however, must not be entirely silent on so important a subject. While not dealing with this school-master critic on the question of pictures, it is sufficient here to touch upon his educational fallacies because they are not only absurd, but absolutely false. Three statements mark the outline of this critic's position: (1) "The picture is not educative." That pictures are educative is a part of the very principles upon which this teacher was himself taught, and by which he teaches, take away his pictures and you may take away his living; to give the picture life is to increase its powers. (2) "The picture cannot be educative." Here the whole world contradicts him and it is hard to answer such a statement because of those difficulties which attend trying "To answer a foolish person according to his folly." (3) "The picture is destructive of education." In each statement he sinks lower and lower, he can only go one step further and state that whatever the eye sees is detrimental to the mind, and blindness would be a benefit.

In supreme foolishness he takes first rank, and is undeserving of being entrusted with the education of young people, he seems absolutely incapable of directing an educational course, or of using tools placed in his hands. From the standpoint of this man the following people must be indeed foolish:—The California State Board of Education have endorsed a plan for the use of the schools of the State as civic centers where moving pictures may be shown. The plan provides that the reels be selected by the board, and the expeness shall be carried by the individual districts. Atlantic City has equipped a special moving picture department in its great and up to date, recently erected school building. Principal Gary M. Jones, of Watertown, N. Y., is having a picture outfit installed to teach such educational subjects as are within the range of kinematography. The Parent-Teacher association of a school in San Francisco is arranging for moving pictures to help it in its work of school and civic development. From Dayton, Ohio, comes the news that the board of education is making up the following programme for their school year: "A summer school with modern play grounds, free text books and moving pictures as deemed proper essentials for satisfactory work."

In Pittsburgh, Pa., they certainly believe in the moving picture. The president of the chamber of commerce presented to the board of education the question of adopting pictures in the following words: "The great popularity of the moving picture; their possibilities as an educational factor, convinces me that this form of amusement and instruction, properly regulated in the well lighted and comfortable halls of our public schools, should be more widely adopted in considering the extended uses of our public school buildings." To every high-minded person this proposal is very forceful and will go a long way towards solving many local problems. The president of the famous University of Cornell, Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, has this to say: "Things are better now than in former days, the tone of the whole institution has been raised. Do you know what has been the cause of this? Why, nothing more or less than the coming of the moving picture." This testimony from one of the greatest educators in America puts the poor little Colorado school-master in a very small class by himself.

St. Louis, Mo., has decided to have all kinds of educational pictures shown in the public parks next summer, and it should be noted that the reels they are going to use will be borrowed from the board of education, which is evidently already well equipped to be able to render such a service. In San Jose, Cal., the Washington school has purchased a Victrola and a moving picture outfit, the students are learning to operate the same, and great expectations are energizing them for the future good of the school. In the High School of Spokane, Wash., a special series of moving pictures was recently given with the object of promoting the higher value of the picture as an aid to general welfare in all phases of life. Time and space forbid further chronicles of the great growth of the helpfulness of the moving picture in schools and colleges everywhere wherever there is light, liberty, ambition and progress, there will be found a course in educational kinematography.

A Minister Made Motion Pictures Possible.

It is a singular fact now established by the courts that the film upon which moving pictures are taken, and indeed upon which the life of the moving picture depends, was first discovered or invented by a clergyman. That the Rev. Hannibal Goodwin, a former Episcopal minister of Newark, N. J., invented the film in the "eighties" was established in a trial between his widow and the Eastman Kodak Company. Until further details are established, the Eastman Company must pay the estate of the Reverend inventor twenty per cent. of the income from future sales of their films. The Rev. H. Goodwin was one of those ministers who believed in using the pictures in the church, the cumbersomeness of glass slides caused him to begin those experiments, which resulted in the film of to-day. It is a pity this good man is not with us to-day, not only to reap the benefit of his great invention, but also to appreciate the greater value of the moving picture, he would surely be on record as a great user of the moving picture.

ILLINOIS STATE PENITENTIARY (Abo. F. F. Co.)

The pictures of the Illinois State Penitentiary are not of a sensational character. Anybody interested in the working machinery of a great American prison will find these pictures very entertaining and instructive besides. They were taken by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago, and under the personal direction of Hon. Edmund M. Allen, warden of the Illinois State Penitentiary. These pictures were obtained by official sanction, and were shown at a special exhibition to the convicts at the Joliet Penitentiary before they were offered to the public. They were very well received by the prisoners, who expressed their opinion that a moving picture of this kind would be of great value in teaching the public just what prison life represents.

The production is in four reels, and it gives a very fair conception of the daily routine in the prison, and the life of the convicts. It takes in every department of the great institution and depicts many interesting details. The pictures are offered on state right plan, as can be seen by the advertisement on another page.

THE BACON INDUSTRY.

From the Bureau of Animal Industry, of the United States Department of Agriculture, announcement is made that motion pictures of the famous "Brooks-Bacon," of Brooks County, Georgia, are to be made for the purpose of demonstrating in other parts of the country those principles which have made this industry famous and profitable. Mr. Downing, of the States Bureau, is going to take charge of the work and believes that with the aid of these pictures he can give some very helpful lectures among the farming communities.

REMOVAL NOTICE.

The Kismet Feature Film Company and the Bryant Feature Film Company's offices have been removed to the World's Tower Building, 110 West 40th Street. This was necessitated, due to the fact that their business has increased to such proportions that the old offices were found entirely inadequate. These offices are equipped in elegant taste and a projection room installed.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

WITH the passing of Proctor's Fifth Avenue Theater nto the motion picture ranks all that part of Manhattan south of 42d Street is left without a straight vaudeville house, and but two houses booking dramatic, comedy and musical productions are left—the old Grand Opera House on 23d Street and the still older Academy of Music on 14th Street. A year ago last August, Keith's Union Square and Proctor's 5th Avenue theaters were among the notable vaudeville theaters listed to combat the motion picture houses. With this object in view the pictures were shut out entirely and the managements endeavored, by augmenting their programs with headliners taken from the legitimate stage, to bring the amusement public to the belief that straight vaudeville was the real thing. Within twenty months the two houses named were rendered hors du combat, and the managers were obliged to announce to the public, "We have met the enemy, and we are theirs." Years ago the Proctor people at the 5th Avenue Theater realized that there were great possibilities for the motion picture, but they were so absorbed in the vaudeville game and the belief that its popularity with the amusement public could not become impaired that they pushed the pictures aside.

Had the Proctor people stuck to the pictures they would probably rank today with the largest and most wealthy producers. They saw something coming, but the vision was not sufficiently vivid to induce them to back it up with investment. It was about twelve years ago "Bill" Steiner, now of the Photo Drama M. P. Company, of this city, and William Paley, now in California, constituted the firm of Paley & Steiner. They were in the motion picture manufacturing business on a comparatively limited scale and frequently supplied the 5th Avenue house with topical subjects. Eventually this firm and Mr. Proctor conceived a plan to take exclusive subjects for use in all the Proctor houses and it was put in operation. Mr. Proctor was to finance the project and Paley & Steiner were to deliver the goods. For some reason the venture was abandoned within a few weeks. It was said at the time that Mr. Proctor thought it was costing too much money. Had they held out for a while longer, and Mr. Proctor had seen into the future as others did, there would undoubtedly have been a different story to write about the climax of the venture. The story picture soon after came to life and brought into distinct view that which was but a vision.

But "it might have been" is an every hour story along the White Way these days. You hear it on every corner, in every clubhouse, in all the booking agencies, and in each grill room. Actors and actresses chide themselves for sticking to the old game so long and failing to see the opportunities developing in the sphere of the silent play. Only yesterday a young woman said "The old line has surely gone to pieces. Managers have nothing worth having to offer. Contracts are practically things of the past. If you start out with a company you don't know whether you will stay out a month or week. I had to give it up; and here I am doing extra work in the pictures. What a fool I was! Five years ago I had a chance to go in stock with the —— picture company, one of the best in existence today. 'Me go into the movies?' I exclaimed. 'Not for mine. I have spent too much time and money for my stage equipment and experience to go into that silly pantomimic game. I am an actress,' said I, 'but lead me to it now, honey.'"

In speaking of "stock," recalls a recent incident in one of the studios. A young man who represented himself as a professional and was applying for a position as such was anxious to fix the identity of each player in a scene he was watching. To several of his queries the answer was, "He is a stock member," or "She is a stock member." After a period of reflection he turned to his informant and asked, "I say, old chap, do you incorporate these people for each play you put on? What do you mean by 'stock member'?"

At this point his accompanying friend impatiently interposed, "Don't be a bloomin' idiot, me boy. Don't you know what stock is? S-t-o-c-k. Stock means progenitor of a family. The gentleman means that these people are a family of players. You surprise me."

Reverting to the Proctor house, it is not intended to discriminate in favor of the Biograph company that produced it, or Mr. D. W. Griffith, who directed the production of "Judith of Bethulia." The reference is necessary in order to clearly bring out the incident. Two actors were seated next to the writer. Before the production they were overheard bemoaning the inroads motion pictures have made upon the theatrical field, and the lack of employment for professionals that it has brought about. Said one of them, "I have studied the matter thoroughly and I cannot account for the great change. Here people sit watching reel after reel, and not a word uttered." The projection of the picture followed, and during the entire time the subject was on neither of the actors spoke above a whisper, so that nothing they said could be overheard. It was evident from their actions, however, that they were deeply impressed by the production. As they were leaving their seats after the final scene, the actor who had previously spoken said to his friend, "Say, Jim, if they keep on producing Biblical subjects like that Billy Sunday and a lot more pulpit pounders will be looking for jobs, like ourselves."

Crude as the expression was, it conveyed the sentiments of a host of people who have seen the production. In conversation after the exhibition a gentleman said, "I have heard many of the most eminent occupants of pulpits and platforms in my time, but never in all my experience has a text been more effectively dealt with than the story of 'Judith' as given in that picture. I doubt that the most eloquent divine of the day could hold an audience more closely than that picture did tonight. All the ear missed was more than made up by the presentation to the eye. If there ever was a doubt that the stage and pulpit can go hand in hand this production dispels it."

The same subject was shown in the Linden Theater, a motion picture house in Brooklyn, one night last week. So tense was the interest of the audience that when a girl foolishly tittered during one of the scenes, more than half the audience sprang to their feet and shouted "Put her out." The manager remarked later, "If that had been a man I think he would have been roughly handled."

Soon the signs reading, "Come in and keep cool while enjoying yourselves" will be swinging in front of the motion picture houses. No, this is not an excess of anticipation. Even the open-air theater men have commenced to show signs of arousing themselves from their hibernation. The other day, while one man was giving a metal screen a coat of paint another was chopping the ice and snow from the platform in front of the screen. The open-air man is a close second to the ground hog, especially when he is not the owner of an in-door place.

Still the house holder has many weeks before him before he need fret about the fellow who has a lot on the corner. It is the opinion of many that in this city there will not be as many open-air places this season as there were last. The reason given for this is that the expense required to fit up a place to comply with the municipal requirements and the uncertainty of weather conditions make open-air propositions much less attractive than in the past. Another reason given is that houses that were able to remain open during last summer with vaudeville will hold the people during the coming summer with picture and picture houses of modern construction are prepared for any season. An exhibitor said the other day "Open-air people will be obliged to handle more up-to-date pictures than they have in the past, to get the business. Many of them are all right, but more of them are pikers coaxed into the business by people trying to get some revenue out of lots. Good airdomes with good service are fair competitors, but I do not think summer squatters, with just enough capital to pay help and hire cheap reels for one week, should be licensed. The junk they handle disgusts the people to such an extent that the ligitimate exhibitor suffers. There should be some way for keeping out the fellow who is only digging for ice-cream money. Before a license is granted the authorities should inquire into the responsibility of the applicant, if for no other reason than to protect the public in case damage claims should arise.

Feature Films.

BILL; our regular Bill, is in trouble again. He wants to know about feature films and why they cost more than he can afford to pay. He writes:

Here is another feature of the game that I wish I could thrash out. Feature pictures—how can I afford to run them? I go up and get my bookings and nearly every time I am accosted by someone who handles their feature stuff. Why don't I use them? The answer is simple—I can't afford to lose money running them. For example: My house seats 450 people. I fill that place full every night with a normal attendance. Now these people all come about the same time. I am in a neighborhood where they get through their supper, go to the show and get to bed early. Suppose I put on a feature picture for one night. It means $40 for two nights or $25 a night. I have to pack my house up to $70 the night I run that picture before I can make expenses over what the night would be normally. I could do this if I was downtown where they keep dropping in, but I can't do this at a neighborhood house and no one else can, because between seven-thirty and nine is when they want their pictures and they won't wait until nine when the next show starts and know that they can't leave much before ten-thirty. The whole point of my argument is that the small exhibitor ought to be able to get his pictures cheaper than the big exhibitor. There ought to be a graduated scale of prices. I realize all the difficulties in the way, but that doesn't alter it a bit in my mind. If I were going to purchase a theater from you and the house held a thousand, I'll bet you would whoop that thousand up to me and make me pay for it because you know it means more revenue if everything is favorable. If that house seated 450 you would probably sell for much less. Of course there is a bigger investment in the first place in a larger house, but aside from this you would naturally place a higher figure on the house because of the seating capacity. Well, here is the ——— Theater in this city, or the ———, or any other house of same size. They get the "Third Degree" from the exchange for the same price I pay. They seat over two thousand and I seat 450. They make money and I lose. I know because I tried it. I also know that they can't begin to book these films out here because the exhibitor knows that he can't make money. I can get these films almost any day because they are booked in only one or two large houses and then remain idle. ———'s books show that. All I need to do is to name the film and day and I can get it with a few exceptions. Now if they let the fellow with the small house have the films cheaper we would all run them and there would be no trouble from the bigger man. Give the large houses the chance at the first runs and then come down in price and let us in. I suppose I am talking through my hat, but it is a fact that I can't afford to give feature pictures in my house because I can't get enough people in the house during show hours to make it pay.

And here's our very note:

In Reply.

Dear Bill:

You are the modestest little cuss! Drop us a line or a couple of lines about the thusness of the why or some simple little thing like that, and we'll ride along with you to the terminal and make the return trip, but you cover the whole feature situation in two paragraphs and we could not cover it in two full and complete issues. As it is, unless a couple of people write and tell the boss how great these Bill letters are, we're durned if we know how long they are going to keep coming to you.

Let's take up first the question of cost. I take it that your inquiry almost entirely comprehends the two reels because you speak of the exchange and not the state rights man. The exchange wants $25 for a two-reel subject one night. You admit the value of these reels to the big house at this price. Do you ask the baker to sell you a five-cent loaf for four cents because you get only $40 a week against Smith, who gets $75? The loaf is worth five cents to you and to Smith because it is worth five cents to the baker. In figuring his costs he figures that he must get five cents for four cents' worth of flour, yeast, water, salt, fire and attendance. That is simple enough, isn't it?

But wait a minute. If your Mrs. wants to make you a bread pudding, I bet she knows where she can go to get "yesterday's bread" for four cents a loaf. There is something yet again. If Blank soaks you $25 for a special this week, he is not selling a fresh special next week or the week after. He does not collect as much for a thirty-day service as he does for a first run. Why should he get as much for a special that is thirty days old as he gets for one that was released yesterday?

Personally I think that a "cold" copy of a film six months or six years old is worth more new than a brand new subject that has been run through thirty different machines in thirty days with 50% of "ham" operators, but the exchanges originated the system of sliding down hill with the age of the film and it is up to them. They started it.

On the Other Hand.

But on the other hand what makes you say that with a capacity of 450 you can't pay $50 for a special. You say you must have $70 in the house to show a profit. Why not get more than $70? Why not make it $100? I take it that you feel that you cannot show a feature at more than ten cents a head, but why not? Don't pay $25 for a two-reel special. Get a four-reel special for $50 and get $106.25 by charging a quarter. You don't have to charge ten cents and only ten cents. Have one special night a week for a quarter per. You are doing business in a good location. Soak them the quarter and make them realize that you are giving more for ten cents on other nights than ten cents should buy. If you'll do that you can afford to play to a small loss on the big night a week just for the moral effect. People will say, "I don't think that 'The White Slave from Painted Rock' is worth a quarter. We got a better show last night for ten cents." They will have all the more respect for your ten-cent show. That is the chief value of some of these "specials." On the other hand, if the show makes good they argue that the picture is better than a ten-cent proposition. You can't lose either way.

Of course if you charge a quarter and the very next day a man down the street offers the same thing for ten or fifteen cents, you lose. The exchange should adopt two sliding scales. The price they charge and the price that may be charged. That is only fair. One of the reasons why the price for specials is kept up is that if they are too cheap a lot of non-thinking exhibitors will make them too cheap. I never thought so well of Carl Laemmle as when he urged all his exhibitors to charge a quarter for "Samson." That is using the brains that God gave him.

It May Work Out.

You'll remember that for a long time the plain picture business was up in the air. You may be able to recall the time that the ten-cent show was an innovation. It's a mighty new business. It is not yet old enough to vote. It only really started in 1896, and it isn't really started yet and the special release is only the development of something more than a year: a year that has brought the dollar-a-head theater and some other things on the strength of the special release. I never found that the exchange manager knew much and I know a lot of exchange managers that know less than seven times nothing at all. You must give them time to get sense, but still, if they charge a certain sum for two first-run reels and let you have them after thirty days for the half or a third of the original charge, it seems to me that if you went at it right, the same scale of prices would apply proportionately to the special stuff if you could convince them that the specials would not be slaughtered. Suppose that he rents the film to you for $25 and you charge a quarter and make money, and he rents it next day to the man down the street, and this man charges ten cents and writes off the deficit to profit and loss per advertising. Someone is going to be hurt and it will be you. In trying to save you from being hurt the exchange man is hurting you, anyway.

The exchange man has nothing to do with the size of your house. If you seat 450 and another man seats 900 this does not alter in the least the rental value of the film. This is, or should be, worth so much on a certain day, no matter where it may be booked. It is not the fault of the exchange manager that your house is just half the size of the other fellow's. He is there to rent you film, not to condole with you on the small capacity you have. If the 900 house makes money and you lose, get a 900 house yourself. Don't curse the exchange man. He has nothing to do with it. Do the best you can with your 450 house. Get the newest and best film you can, and get a fifteen-cent feature now and then, and then a twenty-cent feature, and after a time you can have a regular fifteen or twenty or twenty-five-cent night provided you are careful to explain that on this certain night you will always charge the extra price, so that your regular patrons know this price and do not feel that they are being swindled.

Size Doesn't Count.

In theory the exchange has film to rent and this without reference to the size of the house where it will be shown. In all other lines of business the small tradesman, the corner grocer and the middle-of-the-block meat market pay more for their goods than the big department store that orders by the gross or the ton where they can order by the sixth of a dozen or the hundredweight. You don't see the small man getting butter for nineteen cents against twenty-one for the big store. It's the other way around. Either get the big house or do the best you can with the small one, and between you and me, I'd rather have a good run of one reels with a split farce than all the two and three-part features up to date. Look at Edison. They make only one double a week and they still give the same care to the one reels that they used to give. They'll be the bull market on one-reel stuff when some of the doubles are wondering why someone doesn't have a heart and bury them.

Think over that one-reel stuff, do the right sort of missionary work and every time the chap down the street pulls a fivvr set up a shout that sounds like "You'll always find something to like in our show." So no more at present.

Should Get the Habit.

Steve Farrar, of the Colonial Theater, Eldorado, Ill., sends in some of the advertising of the Grand, DuQuoin, explaining that Reid and Yemm, while reading the MOVING PICTURE WORLD never formed the habit of sending in stuff. We are sorry to see that the Casino runs vaudeville, for the DuQuoin brand of vaudeville is hardly apt to match up with the sort of pictures that even DuQuoin can afford. A team of cyclists and a double talking act are featured on one bill and a concert troupe for the opening night. Southern Illinois used to be called "The Graveyard" by concert troupes in the old days, perhaps it is different now; but even a concert troupe is not as big a show as the same money spent for a special would give. If you have some extra money better put it in better films.

At the same time the advertising matter is well worded, particularly the four-page folder that announced the opening of the new house, and they make a strong appeal to local pride when they say that no house is too good for the city. They should apply that to their billing methods and feel that vaudeville is not good enough. Perhaps some of this material can be adapted by other managers moving into larger quarters:

> We take pleasure in announcing to you, that on next Tuesday evening, February 24th, we will open our beautiful new photoplay house to the public and give the first entertainment in the new Grand Theater, on the corner of Main and Washington Streets.
> For the past seven years we have endeavored to please the public and feel that our efforts have not all been in vain. The years have been pleasant to us, and we sincerely thank you for your patronage during that time.
> Some people have said that we are using bad judgment in erecting such an expensive and elaborate moving picture theater in DuQuoin. We cannot agree with those well-meant statements, because, First, we know there is no photoplay house too expensive or too elaborate for our patrons, and Second, we know our patrons will appreciate it. This satisfies us.
> Millions of dollars are being spent every year equipping theaters for the exhibition of the wonderful photoplays, which are in turn, endorsed by the pulpit, the public and the press. These pictures are of the greatest functions of modern civilization, and we as citizens of DuQuoin, want our city to keep abreast the onward tide of education and entertainment, by having an up-to-date photoplay house. Hence we have, by the expenditure of thousands of dollars, built in the heart of our city a genuine, modern, Moving Picture Theater.

If they could back that straight talk up with good film shows and no indifferent vaudeville.

The lines are snappily written and attract.

By the same token Mr. Farrar also uses vaudeville in one of the houses he runs.

Illegal.

It is a pleasant thing to note that the members of the Motion Pictures Exhibitors' League in Cincinnati have stopped the Country Store stunt. Some non-members introduced the scheme and an appeal to the authorities resulted in a decision that this attraction is a lottery and therefore illegal. There are some places where it is not easy to tell whether you are buying groceries and getting a photoplay free or vice versa, and the craze for gift distribution has reached a point where profits dwindle. Other branches of the league should take the matter up whether the offenders are members of the league or not. An appeal to the lottery laws would quickly suppress this growing evil. There was a time when the country store was a novelty, but that time is long since passed and the sole excuse for its being has ceased to exist. Here is a matter that should be taken up at Dayton and thoroughly discussed. If the league will abandon the practise it will not matter that "the other fellow does it," for an appeal to the proper authorities will quickly put a stop to it and if the city authorities will not act the state authorities will.

Never were there so many factors for good in putting the pictures on a higher plane. The conduct of a lottery of some sort several nights each week is one of the most detrimental phases.

Jusso.

A writer says, in speaking of our recent remarks:

> For my part, I am thankful for all the advice I can get and the more it stings the better I like it, because I remember it longer.

That is precisely the idea. The harder the hit the more marked the impression and the longer it lasts.

Too Much.

The Little Theater, Covington, Va., sends in a dodger and D. R. Ellis wants to know what we think of it. We think there is a little too much of it. We do not believe that it will be read through. It would have been better to have used several different bills, each giving a part of the story, but each complete in itself. It tells of the switch to Universal pictures and it tries to tell the entire story. People it is to be presumed, are not yet particularly interested in Universal releases, and so they will not stop to read the entire bill. Various bits of the bill could have been played up in a handbill that could be read and assimilated at a glance, and one item that is read is worth a dozen that are merely glanced at. Take this, for instance:

BIGGEST IN THE WORLD
That's no exaggeration.
Facts prove that the UNIVERSAL Makes More Film Makes Better Film
than any company anywhere.
After this
ALL THE BIG UNIVERSALS will be at the LITTLE THEATER
Four and five features a week

That is plenty enough to tell at one time. Get that fact home and go into particulars later on, but feed one fact at a time and do not scare the recipient off with too much material.

How About It?

The Academy of Music, Selma, Ala., announces in the last Academian that it is going out of the feature film business. Here is the announcement:

> It is not the province of the Academy of Music to tell you what you should like, nor even to try to force upon you things which other places seem to crave, but only to offer those things which you, by your patronage, indicate a desire to have. Accordingly, when features like James Hackett in "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Cleopatra," and others proved their popularity here by playing to large audiences at admissions proportionate to their cost to us, we took it that you, as a whole, desired such productions, and arranged for many of them—All Star, Famous players, Lubin, Continental and Lasky features—at a cost to us so great that the mention of the figure would but lose for us that bit of reputation for veracity which we may now have. And for a while such a desire did exist, but the patronage given "Checkers" and "Quo Vadis?" seemed to mark its passing, temporarily, at least. And so it behooves us to discontinue for a time the big productions which we had planned for exhibition on Thursdays. We could not possibly exhibit these pictures at regular admissions; and, to be perfectly frank, we seem but to incur the enmity of many people whose good will we strongly desire by increasing the sale price of a ticket in proportion to the increased cost to us.

Now we are not "fer nor against" the feature film. We have always believed that two good one-reel subjects are better than one two-reel subject that is a two-reel subject merely because it has been run up to two thousand feet. More than that we do not believe that all houses can take the multiples and run them to a profit. We believe that the Academy can two or three multiples each week, and always at the special price.

This slump with the Kleine Quo Vadis might be more directly traceable to the lenten season than a cessation of interest. On the other hand, perhaps they have had too many multiples and perhaps not always the best. It may be that they have come to regard with suspicion all multiple reels because some of these have been bad, and not always is a surplus of footage a sign of great merit.

One Reelers Always.

We do not believe that there will ever come a time when the one-reel subjects will not be in demand. There probably will come a time when there will be in each town of any size feature and one reel houses, with the feature house using one-reel subjects to make the length, but the one-reel will always be in demand and the present tendency to slight the making of one-reels in favor of two or more parts is just as foolish as that other tendency to build a one-reel story into a two-part film with purely padding material.

On the other hand, we believe that there will never be a time again when no film will run more than the thousand feet. We are inclined to think that the Academy has been "rushing the season" and giving the public more of the multiples than the particular public that patronizes that particular house will assimilate.

We think that one feature night a week, when it is understood that a feature will be shown at an advanced price, would be better than none at all. Later on perhaps a second night can be added and a third and even a fourth, but the Academy made the change too suddenly and it booked the product of certain companies rather than the best of the offerings, which is and ever will be foolish in the extreme.

Features should be added cautiously and only the best of these booked and the "best" for one house may be the worst for another. In any event the management should see the features and book only what has been seen. We are going to watch the outcome with interest.

Anyhow the Academian will keep on going, and that's something.

And on Top of That.

And on top of the statement of the Academy that it cannot show features at ten cents, comes the Star Theatre, St. Joseph, Mo., to say that it must charge ten cents for features because it cannot afford to do it for five.

Five days of a recent week it charged ten cents for Warner's features with two five cent days of three reels of Mutual film. The features were all in three parts, the same as the regular three single-reel programs. C. C. Trump announces them in a program, a four page folder that is a little too long for its width but well edited and well set. Taking off two inches from the bottom of this program would get a better looking issue, but it is clean work as it stands. The shortening may be possible by running up on the present announcement page, but we think that a clean-cut announcement is better than the full description of the subjects, and Mr. Trump writes straightforwardly and with conviction.

Here's Another Appeal.

M. Whitmoyer, of the Lyric Theater, Upland, California, writes that he and his printer between them are not able to get a particularly good idea for a weekly program and he asks the aid of some of those who have good ones. Will some of you with good programs please help out? Mr. Whitmoyer adds that he seldom has anything good to send in to this department. He might send in some of the stuff that is not good. Sometimes comment on the mistakes is as helpful as comment on the successes. Anyhow, he needs a little help just now and we are sure that some of the contributors will help along.

Sending Pictures.

Will those who are good enough to send us in photographs of their advertising displays please add to our obligation by sending them in such shape that they can be used after they get here? To send an unmounted print folded in a newspaper may be saving postage, but the cost of the stamps and the photographs, too, is wasted if the picture comes in so badly cut and creased that it cannot be sent to the engraver. We are always glad to get recent photographs of advertising displays for this department, but we like to be able to get something that we can print from.

All Pink.

H. H. Raymond sends in some of the advertising of the Rosemary Theater, Ocean Park, California. The bills are all on pink (probably rose pink) paper. They are all well worded and smartly worked, but they offer not much that is available to others, but this line we like:

The Universal gets the people, the plays, the pictures.
The Rosemary Gets the Universal
You get the Rosemary.
Complete, compact and comprehensive, yes?

And every blessed piece of paper is headed "Rosemary Pink Sheet." It assuredly does pay to have a trademark, even if it is only a color.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

That Vitagraph Contest.

THERE is just one little paragraph in the details of the Vitagraph-Evening Sun photoplay contests that makes all the difference in the world to the contestants. The Vitagraph reserves the right to purchase at regular rates any script submitted that does not qualify for one of the prizes, PROVIDED that the price offered is acceptable to the author. In other words, the fact that the Vitagraph pays $1,000 for the best play submitted does not give them the legal and moral right to buy up the rest of the availables at five or ten dollars a reel. It is the first of these script contests carrying this proviso and therefore the first to be conducted on a basis of fairness to the author.

For the benefit of those who may not be able to obtain the Evening Sun, the conditions are reprinted here. Scripts should be addressed to the Photoplay Contest, The Evening Sun, New York City, and not to the Vitagraph Company.

The Evening Sun, in cooperation with the Vitagraph Company, offers:

$1,000 for the best Photo Play, whether Drama, Comedy or Melodrama, submitted under the conditions following:

$250 for the Second Best Photo Play so submitted.

$100 for the Third Best Photo Play so submitted.

In addition the Prize Plays will be produced by the Vitagraph Company in its best style and widely advertised as Prize Photo Play. The names of the authors will appear on the films, and they will receive all due publicity. The prize winners, if suitable, will be produced at the Vitagraph Theater, New York. The Vitagraph Company will also purchase, at its usual liberal rates, such others of the plays submitted as it can use, and reserves the right to so purchase any manuscript submitted provided the price offered is acceptable to the author.

The Evening Sun reserves the right to publish in fiction form the stories of the prize winning plays.

All plays must be capable of being made in America, must be from one to six reels in length and must be in The Evening Sun office at noon May 1. Contestants may send any number of plays, but only one prize will be awarded to any one person. Employees of The Evening Sun, The Sun and the Vitagraph Company cannot compete. Original work only will be considered. Dramatization of printed works are barred.

The prizes will be awarded by May 15, if possible, and awards will be made according to the best judgment of the five judges, who will be John Bunny and Maurice Costello of the Vitagraph Company, two experienced members of The Evening Sun staff and E. M. La Roche, associate editor of the Moving Picture Story Magazine. The judges may reject any and all plays. Should all be rejected, the offer will be renewed.

The controlling factor in the award will be the novelty, vitality and the acting value of the dramatic or comedy idea submitted.

Each scenario must be signed with a nom de plume or cipher and must be accompanied by a sealed envelope bearing the nom de plume or cipher and containing the competitor's name and address. Every care will be taken of manuscripts, but no responsibility for them will be accepted. Competitors should keep a carbon copy.

The "Words" on the Screen.

(By Emmett Campbell Hall.)

Alan Dale, dramatic critic, says he had an awfully good time at the opening of the Vitagraph Theater, where he had "Nothing to do but look!" And adds, somewhat naively: "I prefer my own imagination to the 'words' that are cast on the screen. Sometimes these words, banal and trite, spoil the illusion. In pictures one can imagine such a lot! I love them when they don't dot the i's and cross the t's." Unconsciously, I take it, Mr. Dale's instinct as a dramatic critic has led him to pounce upon the one really glaring defect in the modern photoplay. Unfortunately, he doesn't suggest any substitute for this apparently necessary evil—possibly because he doesn't realize that there is a necessity for the "words", or an adequate substitute.

Theoretically, of course, a perfect photoplay would be without subtitles, the story being clearly conveyed by the action alone, without the necessity of one imagining such a lot, or anything at all. The author is supposed to do the imagining necessary. In reality, such a picture would be boring in the extreme, for the reason that all action would take place in one set and there could be no presumption of lapsed time—all the business would have to occur in about fifteen minutes time, actual and fictional, taking a single reel as an example. It would be practically impossible to establish, develop and conclude any consequential story within such limits—the best that could be done would be to show a single dramatic incident. Both lapsed time and change of scene could be accomplished by dissolves, of course, but to a very limited extent, and dissolves and visions would prove quite inadequate or hopelessly clumsy in the development of a complex modern photoplay.

I quite agree that in many cases the "words" used are sadly banal and trite, particularly when the subtitle is used merely as a drop curtain to break action, but this is a matter easily remedied by a little ingenuity combined with fair knowledge of English. The constantly recurring "The Next Day"—"A Year Later"— and similar bald statements of fact is irritating, but to my mind is much less objectionable than solemn statements of the obvious, such as: "Tom meets Mary," when we have already been informed of the identities of the young couple and a moment later see them meet. It would be just as easy to say "An Unexpected" or "Unfortunate", or "Delightful" meeting, or just "A Meeting," if it is desired to maintain suspense for an instant and the encounter is unpremeditated by the characters. If it is an appointment, "They Meet," would at least be a slight variation of form, with the further merit of not anticipating the situation.

It is with the labored explanation, anticipating action, that I find the most fault. I have seen excellent productions of good stories utterly ruined by this crime against dramatic art, each scene being made to serve simply as an illustration of the subtitle preceding it. It seems hard to believe, but I have heard that one producer goes so far as to assert that the subtitles alone should tell the complete story! Comment on this is not worth while, particularly if it is true.

Under the most favorable circumstances, subtitles do, undoubtedly, tend to destroy the illusion, and every effort should be made to make them as unobtrusive as possible, while they yet serve their purpose, whether it be merely to break action, or to get over facts that cannot be conveyed in action. Small, clear lettering is a great advantage. Most important of all, however, is to have the wording harmonize with the spirit of the action and the atmosphere of the scenes. This cannot be done if the title is written with a telegram-like economy of words. It is far better to use fifteen words and express the thought to be conveyed clearly and in smooth phrases than to "put it across" in a "snappy" five-word jolt—unless, of course, a jolt is just what is wanted there.

I think that, as a general thing, the quoted or unquoted dialogue form is the best subtitle, conveying a maximum of information in a minimum number of words, and permitting of much more graceful construction. There are, of course, many occasions on which the direct, impersonal statement of fact must be resorted to, but the other form should be used whenever possible, and a little thought frequently shows that it is possible, if not quite so easy. It is not necessary that a subtitle convey a complete idea if the scene which it precedes makes clear that portion of the idea omitted from the title. For instance: We have seen an old mother leave home to search for her missing son. She will next appear in the conventional "West". The horribly frequent form of subtitle to be used here is: "Mrs. Brown arrives in the West in search of her son." I submit—"Have you seen my boy?". The scene will show the old lady questioning a bunch of cowboys with pathetic eagerness, and the idea is completed. Any one with sense enough to acquire a nickel with which to pay his way into the show will "get it". The Average Spectator is not nearly such a fool as some producers seem to think, and, unconsciously perhaps, objects just as strongly as does Mr. Dale to the banal and trite, although he may not happen to know the meaning of those words.

"A good servant but a bad master" applies very well to the subtitle. We must have it, and it is bound to be one or the other. At this time, even where regarded as a servant, it is a particularly unruly and assertive one, badly in need of instruction and kind but firm control.

Read Between Lines.

You must learn to read between the lines as well as the lines themselves if you would know. Here is a letter from a writer who seems to have more than the average of intelligence and yet she finds it hard to combine the varied information she gets in her reading and says:

> For example, one person well up on the subject advises close study of trade magazines and the screen in order to discover what producers are using and therefore want. Hardly has one absorbed this advice than he is told that when a certain kind of pictures are being released by a certain studio, said studio usually has enough of that kind and now probably wants something else.
> Again we are told our scripts must have lots of "story" if they are to sell, and must not be simply a series of events. Then we see a beautifully photographed drama by Kalem, called "Chasing the Smugglers" which can only be called a series of events, surely.
> We are told also that only "slap stick" comedy is now in demand. Would "Courting Betty's Beau" (Edison) be classed as "slap-stick"? And there have been numerous others lately that were just good fun without the "rough house" element.
> Frankly I (and no doubt many others) am very much at sea to figure out what to do with my plays after they are written. What can be done except waste stamps, patience and time?

The matter is very simple. You are told to read the stories of the film and get the stories that the company likes, or seems to like. You read and learn that the Gumph Company wants a rather vivid melodrama. The Gumph releases say a hundred vivid melodramas a year. These, you can see, are mostly done in California with few interior sets. The deduction is that the Gumph wants vivid melodramas with few interior sets used. This is correct. Suddenly you find that the Gumph is releasing now and then a story using a ship and seashore stuff. You rush to the Gumph all the seashore stuff you have, and back it comes with the note that they are not in the market for this material. What's the answer?

The answer is that the Gumph makes vivid melodramas mostly in the open air. It happened that a ship went ashore not far from where the Gumph is located. They bought the right to make pictures aboard her. They faked all the stories of sea life they could think of, moved the company from the mountains to the shore, made up all the stories and went back to the home studio to make vivid melodramas mostly outdoors in California. They are back home by the time the first of these are on the screen and they are not in the market for any more because the ship has either been broken up or floated off.

Therefore read the Gumph stories, note that they want vivid melodramas made in the open and ignore the "water stuff" until you have reason to believe or have been told that they are in the market for the water stuff right along. If you could read between the lines, or if you read all that appears in this department, you would have known that the water stuff was something special and not the regular stuff.

Take a concrete case. Last season there were two Lubin companies in Jacksonville. They were merged in three Arabian stories under George Nicholls, the dramatic director. While he was using all the people Arthur Hotaling came up to New York, hired some negro players and told us just what scripts he wanted. Then he went back and made several Zulu and negro subjects. About the time the Arabian and Zulu stuff came out and the Lubin editorial department was swamped with Arabian and Zulu stories, the comedy section was working in Atlantic City and the dramatic director was in New York, his contract having expired. Neither special topic was longer desired, but the regular Lubin demand continued.

As to story, we do not know that anyone has said that a release must have "lots of story" so much as well defined plot instead of a sketchy series of events. Now and then the incident release will come along. We have not seen the Kalem mentioned, but one sketchy series of incidents is not to be accepted as a complete change of style of production. Try to suit the average of a company and not the exception.

In the same way there are lots of stories produced by Edison, Vitagraph and a few others that are good fun, clean humor without horseplay, but the general demand is for slapstick stuff. The majority of companies want stuff "like Keystone" and this is merely the sort that Lubin used to make several years ago and which is again being made by that company by one of the directors who invented the style. That is the demand. Edison and a few others want the lighter comedy, but the general demand is for horseplay.

If you can read between the lines you can market without wasting "stamps, patience and time," but to do so you must learn to apply the information given you, to study it over and realize what it means and not merely skim it over and then feel puzzled.

The League.

We were rather surprised the other day to receive an invitation to get together with the Congressman who is, on paper, supposed to be going to get the Copyright privilege for unpublished scripts. We thought our position was too well known, but it seems it is not.

We know, what others fail to realize, that the essence of the Copyright Law is publication. Publication is the public presentation of the matter to be copyrighted. Until the matter is published it is not in any way, shape or fashion eligible for copyright under the present laws, and we do not think that the law will ever be changed to class legislation. If the unpublished script can be copyrighted, so can every unpublished story and poem, every unpublished song and every unpublished drawing. The entire Library of Congress would not be sufficiently large to permit the proper handling of the matter that would pour in.

Since we first spoke of the Los Angeles League we have been advised that the league bulletin will carry in synopsis form all products of its members for which they wish to claim copyright. One hundred or five hundred synopses can be copyrighted as a single entry and the authors will have full copyright protection.

But what do they get?

They get the right to sue under Copyright instead of common law.

Only this morning one of our scripts came back from Arthur Hotaling with the remark that he had made it ten days before we sent the story in and that he had also made it some years ago. The story, so far as we were concerned, was original. It was not precisely like the story lately made yet not like its ancient prototype. Suppose we had copyrighted the story. Would we have been able to have prevented the release of a story five years ago along similar lines? Our story was not like Mr. Hotaling's but it was sufficiently like it to be barred from release by the same company and from being offered to any other company, yet we could have copyrighted this story. What protection, then, does copyright bring? It requires the same process of law, but in the Federal instead of the local courts. The burden of proof still lies with the author.

What does he get?

And yet authors are asked to pay ten dollars a year in the hope of getting copyright that any competent lawyer knows to be impossible.

We hold no grouch against the League, to the contrary we wish that we might sit in with the charter members, most of whom are our personal and valued friends, but at the risk of losing these friends we would like to ask what possible good this league can do any person to the extent of any part of ten dollars, from the full ten to the sum of one cent.

We opposed the League once started in Philadelphia by a person who was a total stranger to us. We oppose this league composed of our personal friends. We will oppose any and all leagues that profess their ability to perform the impossible.

Thinking It Over.

Thinking it over, we believe that the recent photoplay dinner was the best ever, if not the biggest. Only thirty-eight covers were used, but it was a fine meeting for all that. With J. Stuart Blackton in the chair, the members seemed to be trying to do their best. The result was an absence of most of the usual foolish talk and some good common sense.

It is noteworthy, too, that Mr. Blackton, in his note of acceptance, promised to stay as long as he could but did not think that he could stay very long. We do not know how long he stayed for he was still there when we headed for the subway.

These dinners are useful in getting the writers, big and little together, and yet Marc Edmund Jones, who owes as much to the Inquests as any man we know of, writes supercilliously that certain well known directors who are members of his Photoplay League are "uninterested in the Inquest and Ed-Au clubs" because of the social features. So far as we know no one ever asked them to become interested with the possible exception of one man who was given an indirect invitation to come down to an Inquest some time. Men like Mr. Blackton are big enough to come down and be interested, but it's different with directors.

Now It's Curwood.

The newest broadcast advertisement is that of a school in Wilkes-Barre which is being published all over the country. The last "national campaign" was conducted by Watt and few of the publishers ever saw a penny of their money as the "advertising agency" decamped after placing the business.

This new school states that one man has made $3,500 in six months, and says it in such a way as to suggest that it is one of their pupils. We are inclined to think that this means James Oliver Curwood. There is some difference between a successful novelist and a novice. We do not know five men in the world who are making $7,000 a year writing plays and this statement is misleading if not a downright lie.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

P. B. K.—"A year passes" is not "better form" than "A year passed." It is the only possible form since photoplays are told in the present tense. A year passes as the leader runs. That two reeler is all right so far as environment goes. Simply announce "A two-reel subject requiring two interior sets and 18 exterior locations." Use your own judgment as to outlines. One should, as a rule, be sufficient. Try that scheme of a small sheet of paper to each scene.

H. C. Z.—Ford Sterling was Zu-Zu the bandmaster. Address scripts to the Photoplay Department. Do not attempt to negotiate beforehand. Do not write you have a great play that you will send if they are interested. Send it and see if they are. See advertisement. Keystone, receiving a full script would offer to pay on the synopsis if they liked it. They would not let go of it merely because it was a full script.

C. B. S.—You are too lazy. If you are "competent" to write full scripts do so. If you want to see what the companies want, study the stories of the films in each issue. If you read this paper all the way through each week you would understand lots of things that now puzzle you. Now get busy like some of the rest are doing and all of us have done. You'll never make a Marathon racer if you want to use crutches to save your feet, and you won't write plays until you get willing to work out your own salvation. And don't talk about "journalism." A man who gets money from a newspaper calls himself a newspaper man.

R. C. L.—If you can sell to hard markets the easier should be open to you. Get busy. No reason why anyone should object to a plot about a photoplay. It looks all right. You don't seem to need to worry much.

B. A. B.—Companies taking synopses only generally want synopses only and pay for the synopsis only even on a full script. It is not always in the interest of cheapness, but because of some peculiarity of production style. The Mutual proper will take either full script or synopsis and pay in proportion. Mr. Woods is singularly liberal in his ideas as to what an idea without the plot of action is worth, but then, he is liberal, anyhow. We would not believe the statement covered by the second question. We do not think they know what is what. The author can sell to precisely the same advantage as the various selling agencies.

H. R.—The company, we believe, has made two or three direct releases in as many years. Mostly they sell their negative when they make any.

L. J. W.—The paper is too thin. Scripts should be folded but twice lengthwise and put in a No. 10 envelope. If you don't know any more about No. 10 envelopes than the last correspondent who asked, number tens are 4⅛ by 9½ inches. Vitagraph is in the market for multiples, but is buying little at present, as it wants to see what the prize contest turns up.

E. J. G.—There is no rule as to dividing multiples. Some companies want one full script and others want the story divided into parts. Work it the way most convenient to you and you'll be right half the time, anyhow.

N. H., Jr.—"When the Earth Trembled" was a Lubin. It was released about November, 1913, as part of the short-lived "Exclusive Service" of the General Film. These stories were not announced to the papers, as the release day was too elastic, which is why there was no record. You can probably book it from the General Film now. It was a most pretentious production dealing with the San Francisco earthquake. Two reels, we think.

Biograph—You don't belong in here, do you? You're welcome, anyhow. Miss Pearl White is the star of Crystal Films. (Are You related to Antony?) "The Perils of Pauline" is advertised in recent issues. Made with Pathe players by the Eclectic Company.

J. B.—Miss Adele Lane was Venus in "The Story of Venus." We cannot explain trick pictures here. Takes up too much space. We do not recall that Mr. Bunny has appeared in dramatic pictures since he made his reputation, but we do recall him in "bits" in dramatic pictures while he was getting used to the camera and before he was known to the fans. This about three years ago.

M. W.—Miss Vivian Rich played with Mr. Kerrigan in "The Song of the Soup." The reason you do not see Miss Normand is probably that you do not get the right Keystones.

M. V. D.—Miss Bessie Eyton was Josephine in "The Up-Hill Climb." Guess again on that second title. "Judith of Bethulia" seems to be the film you want to locate. Quite a little different from "Joan of Beulah." Next time you write just ask questions, please.

H. M. W.—And after all we've said about it! Mr. Woods is editor of the Mutual Film Corporation. If you want the address see the note above.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of the Moving Picture World and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In the case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps, to cover cost, will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 27.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose you are employed as operator for a theater in course of construction. The available current supply is 110 volt, 60 cycle a.c. The manager asks you what will be the relative cost of using (a) resistance, (b) economizer, (c) motor-generator set. He also asks you to estimate the saving (current 9 cents per k.w.) effected by using an economizer, as against resistance; also, the saving effected by purchasing a motor-generator set, as against resistance, and as against an economizer. Would your answer be in any way changed if the current were 25 cycle or 135 cycle instead of 60?

The man who can answer this question and answer it well will prove himself to be pretty well posted in the practical end of operating room electrics.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 21 is short. It consists of Jos. H. M. Smith, Forth Worth, Texas; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada; Seattle, Washington; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, New York; Chicago, Illinois; Boston, Massachusetts; and Lee Kelly, Fort Flagler, Washington; all of whom sent in excellent replies.

One paragraph of friend Dobson's reply I wish to quote; it is as follows:

> The neutral point can be stated to mean the time when the coils connected to the brushes generate no current. The duty of the commutator is to change the connection of the armature coils from the positive to the negative side of the circuit at the time at which the coil connected to the bar under the brushes passes from the influence of one pole piece to the opposite one. This is the time at which the current reverses its direction, and is therefore called the neutral point.

We have selected the reply of W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, as being best, everything considered. Let it be understood, however, that the publication of an answer does not necessarily mean that it is perfect; it simply means that it is the best answer submitted, everything considered, and I want you fellows who find anything wrong in an answer to criticise it. That is a part of the intent and purpose of these questions—to bring out the best available knowledge in the best possible form.

Reply to Question No. 21.

By W. S. James, Camden, N. J.

The question:

Why is it that carbon brushes are most largely used? Suppose a salesman tried to sell you copper brushes for your motor or generator, making the claim that they were best, most economical, etc.—let us hear what you would answer. In other words, would he make the sale or not, and why? Explain the electrical reason for shifting brushes ahead of the neutral point under load, and, by the way, tell us what the "neutral point" is. Why is the failure of the brushes to make good contact with commutator a very serious matter, aside from tendency to spark? What is meant by "chattering" of the brushes—its causes, effect and remedy?

The Answer:

Carbon brushes are best and are most used by reason of the fact that they better withstand fluctuations in voltage without sparking. The salesman could not sell me copper brushes for the generator of an isolated plant. The first reason for this is that the brush holders are made for radial brushes and metal brushes could not work in this position, they being designed to work tangential. Another reason is that the machines in an isolated plant would admit of being reversed, and if I were to use copper brushes this could not be done without changing the holders. Still another reason is that in d.c. production, or consumption, soft carbon brushes are best because they have comparatively high resistance, and the action of this resistance is to limit the value of the current, to a certain extent, generated in the armature coils as they pass under the brushes, and this operates to reduce sparking. Owing to the resistance of the carbon brushes it admits of wide variation in load in the non-sparking position of the brushes—that is to say, without moving the brushes circumferentially on the commutator—without causing trouble. On the sets commonly used for moving picture work the load is constantly changing by reason of the variable resistance of the arc. When the load changes it has a tendency to change the non-sparking position, or neutral point. Of course the compounding reduces this tendency considerably, but when we light the two arcs in such a way that we temporarily overload the generator there is a slight changing of the neutral position, due to distortion of the magnetic lines of force, but carbon brushes will take care of this overload on a compound machine without shifting the brushes, whereas metallic brushes would not do this. The metallic brush is of such comparatively low resistance that the short circuited coil generates sufficient e.m.f. to force a large current through the local circuit comprising the coil, two commutator bars and brush which in its effort to escape causes sparking; hence with metallic brushes we would either have to be constantly changing the brush position or else have almost constant sparking which would operate to injure the commutator.

The neutral point of a generator is theoretically a point midway between the polar horns, i.e. the extremities of the field coils of the machine. This, however, is not so in practice, for the reason that in the manufacture of machines the coil ends do not connect with the commutator bars opposite the slot in which the coil is actually wound. This is called "giving the coils a lead", and is done for convenience in widening. Suppose we number the armature slots 1, 2 and 3, etc., and the corresponding commutator bars the same, then coil 1 might connect with bar 6, and the neutral point might be parallel with the pole pieces instead of between them.

The neutral point is the point at which the current in the coil reverses its direction and the point at which the coil passes from the influence of one pole piece to another of opposite polarity. There are several things which theoretically necessitate shifting the brushes ahead on the commutator as the load increases, and still further ahead on an overload, and vice versa. Considering the neutral point to be midway between the polar horns, when the armature in not running, lines of force travel straight through between the north and south pole of the field coils. Now as lines of force can never intersect each other we have two neutral points for each pair of poles, and this sets up a magnetic field in which the armature is immersed. These lines of force tend to retard any rotary movement of the armature, and the stronger the lines of force the greater this effect.

Broadly, it is the armature pulling against these lines of force which generates current in coils, and if e.m.f. be applied to the generator from the outside wires this magnetic action will be reversed: the armature will run in the opposite direction, and the generator will become a motor. In the generator this magnetic pull is called torque, and as power is applied to the armature there is a tendency to pull the lines of force of the magnetic field out of their natural position, which is called distorting the magnetic field. And it is this distortion which causes the changing of the neutral point as the load varies. It therefore follows that the greater the load the greater will be the distortion of the magnetic field, and the neutral point will be moved forward and the brushes must also be moved to coincide if we are to obtain the full e.m.f. generated in the armature coils.

The failure of brushes to make good contact with the commutator is a serious matter, aside from the tendency to sparking, by reason of the fact that there is greater resistance offered to the local circuit of the coil if the brushes fail to make good contact with the commutator, and thus there will be a large added waste of energy.

Chattering of the brushes may be caused by the brushes being loose in their holders, or by a rough or sticky commutator surface. The effect is loss of power. The remedy is to clean the commutator if it is sticky, smooth it up if it is rough, or fit the brushes to the holder according to where the fault lies.

Horsepower.

W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, and others have written asking if Question No. 30 means brake horse power, or just horse power. I expect you to give us the data both ways.

Important Agreement.

The Seattle Convention presumably settled the factional fight which has been raging among New York operators for the past year or more. The American Federation of Labor, however, through misinformation, was induced to make a ruling that operators of the dissenting faction should be admitted to local 306 without examination, but upon the true facts being laid before the body this ruling was reversed, and an agreement was reached in substance as follows: That members of the organization of the dissenting faction must take an examination as to their competency for admission in Local Union 306, and that an examining committee of three be formed, one member of it to be appointed by the president of the I. A. T. S. E., one member by Past President John J. Barry of the I. A. T. S. E., and one to be selected by Secretary Morrison of the A. F. of L., from a list of ten names submitted to him. Under this agreement the following have been selected as a committee to examine members of the organization of the dissenting faction and determine their qualifications for membership in local 306: Third Vice-President, William Canavan, St. Louis; Ward, Springfield, Mass., and James F. Burke, Boston, Mass., all members of moving picture operators' unions. It was agreed that the books of local 306 should be opened at an initiation fee of $5.00 during the two weeks commencing March 16, 1914, extending to March 28, 1914. The examining committee went into session March 30th, and will remain in session up to and including April 4, 1914, and will examine all applicants whose applications for membership are filed on or before March 28th. After March 28th the initiation fee of local 306 will again be $15.00, and after the examining committee as provided is through with the examinations, filed prior to March 28th all applicants must go through the regular routine of application for membership. Any operator making application and not appearing before the special committee will be required to pay an additional $10.00 and will be examined by the committee of 306. It was also agreed by the representative of the organization of the dissenting faction that they surrender their charter, seal, papers and books to the president of the I. A. T. S. E.

It is to be sincerely hoped that this agreement will put a final quietus on the fight which has done so much damage to the interest of the New York operators. It has been a one-man affair from start to finish and it is our prophecy that if this individual is admitted to local 306 the trouble will promptly start all over again. Unfortunately this individual is a man of surpassing energy which if rightly directed would be of great value and benefit, but in the past his efforts seem to have been made with a view to making himself the "Moses" of the New York operators. He has ignominiously failed but it's an open question whether his capacity for making trouble is at an end or not. Let us hope for the good of the movement in New York that it is.

New York Laws, Rules, Etc.

Brooklyn, N. Y., sends in a complaint as follows:

> The "powers that be" say that no one but a man with a license shall operate a machine. Now in small houses where but one operator is employed, if he is taken sick during a show, what is he going to do? Shut down the show, and lose his job, or take the chance of losing his license? Suppose he was suddenly called home in case of death in his family, or for any of a dozen reasons which might necessitate his immediate presence. What is he going to do? Recently a member of my own family died very suddenly and I was not called home, for the very simple reason that it was known it would be impossible for me to leave the theater without shutting down the show. I have a couple of kiddies of my own. What would I do if word came saying that one of them had met with a serious accident? Would I be in fit condition to run a projector under those conditions? Would it be safe for me to run one? Yet the effect is I would either have to do it or they would have to close the theater, until a licensed operator could be procured. Now it seems to me that all this could be obviated if the operator were allowed an apprentice, who, after he had served for a certain length of time, could be given a permit to run the machine in case of emergency, but only where a licensed operator is employed, and only under his orders. Another thing: who has authority over operating rooms? The Fire Department, or the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity? Why is it necessary to close the operating room door any more than to close the lens port or the observation port, provided the door be so arranged that it will close automatically in case of accident? In my own case it is impossible to get ventilation and sufficient heat (in winter) with the door closed, but the other day up comes Mr. Fireman and proceeds to raise Cain about the door being open, claiming it to be a violation. I have a card of rules and know I must obey them. However, when I explained to the inspector of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity that I must have ventilation, he told me to keep the door open, provided it was so arranged that it would instantly close in case of accident. He said he had orders from the head of the Department that the door could be kept open. Mr. Fireman countermands this. Now whom am I to obey?

This brings up the old question of the number of cooks we have attending to the kettle of broth here in New York City. The operating room door ought to be closed when the machine is running. However, if the Fire Department wants the door closed, then as a matter of common decency and ordinary humanity it is up to the Fire Department to see to it that the room is fit to be inhabited by the operator when the door is closed. As a matter of cold-blooded fact, however, the Fire Department makes rules and regulations without knowing or caring two whoops in the new Jerusalem what the effect of those rules and regulations will be. They also make rules which overlap, counteract, and contradict the orders of other departments, and, as a matter of fact, as I have pointed out before, we have three departments, viz: Building Department, Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity and the Fire Department, each seeking to regulate and control the same identical thing. There have been cases where the theater manager has made observation ports to comply with orders from the Building Department, only to be obliged to rip the whole business out and change it completely in order to satisfy the Fire Department, or vice versa. So far as I can see, the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity is the only department that has exercised any degree of common sense in the regulation of motion picture operating room affairs. The rules of the Fire Department are a joke, and a mighty bad joke at that, in so far as they apply to operating rooms. There is not a fireproof operating room in this entire city—not one; or at least if there is one I do not know of it. Yet there are hundreds of them that by the expenditure of a few dollars, plus a little ordinary, plain, common sense, could be made fireproof in every sense of the word. Yet the Fire Department does not know this, or at least it does not seem to know it. If they are interested in having fireproof operating rooms in which whole reels of films may be burned without the audience knowing anything about it, the editor of this Department will demonstrate to them, in five minutes' conversation, just how it can be done, or he will agree to forfeit any reasonable sum of money, say $500, if he fails to do so. This knowledge has been available for a long time, but the Fire Department seems to know about as much about the actual practical fireproofing of the operating room as a hog does about Heaven. Moreover, it does not seem to think it worth while to acquire this knowledge. Well, I am not going to chase after them with it. If they want it let them come to me and get it. As to the other matter; while small theater operators are placed in a very bad position, I do not think your plan for remedying this would be practical, and I don't see any other feasible scheme either. If any readers can suggest one, let them stand forth and be heard.

Says He "Bit" For $15.00.

Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, states that the set of books and correspondence course of the American School of Correspondence, are a grand and glorious "frost." Says he "bit" for $15.00, and that the machines therein described are the Power's Five, Selig, Polyscope, Lubin, Edengraph, and Edison Two Pin Universal. Brother Dobson sends samples of films taken by Mr. Brick, of the Garden Theater, Toronto.

The photography in the films seems to be very excellent. As to the books: I am publishing this because it is one of a great many similar letters. I would advise operators to examine closely into the matter before paying $15.00 for a "course" and set of books. The machines named are all long since out of date. I don't care about commenting on this matter, or going extensively into it. I am not sure I have seen the books you refer to. The Cyclopedia of Motion Picture Work, a set of two volumes, put out by the American School of Correspondence, deals with the Motiograph, Edison Exhibition Model, Power's Six and Standard, though I do not regard the instructions, on these machines, therein contained as being of any considerable value to the operator. I think if the American School of Correspondence had a course of large value they would have long ago presented it to this department for examination and approval. It looks that way to me.

A Hanging Bee?

C. B. Estes, Brooklyn, Michigan, in speaking of our comment on an exhibitor who ran his picture at a five-minute-to-the-reel-clip, describes a performance he saw in a small town in Michigan, which contained about every fault one would expect to find in projection. The theater was without competition in a town of 4,500, yet the exhibitor claimed he was not making money. The aforesaid exhibitor could see nothing wrong in the performance, although, according to brother Estes, it was the rankest kind of rank, with the picture jumping up all over the screen, and shadows and misframes galore. Friend Estes winds up by asking whether the patrons of this "manager" would be justified in connecting him to a lamppost with a piece of good, stout, hempen rope. Also whether the aforesaid patrons would be entitled to a vote of thanks for doing so.

Now, I would not want to answer that question. I have myself sat through performances where I would really, at the time, have been delighted to have seen the manager made into a bologna sausage by the most painful method possible. Still, however, as a law abiding citizen I cannot advise hanging theater managers, even though they be mis-managers. I would, however, suggest that the patrons could easily hang him financially, by individually and collectively remaining away from his "theater," and that perhaps would be the better plan.

Lens Trouble.

I. Kresh, New York City, has trouble as follows:

> Since my Power's machine was repaired my lens projects a picture about four inches larger than before. This makes the illumination a little less brilliant, and the focus is not as sharp as it was. The lens was not taken apart, as you might think. I simply cleaned it and put it in the machine and the trouble started. I clamped the back combination down and tried to slack off a little in the barrel, but with no better result. Also moved the machine ahead as much as possible to make the throw shorter, yet the picture is still too large. This same lens gives me a great deal of trouble. Whenever I take it out and put it back the light will not be centered the same on the screen, and every time I turn the tube, or barrel, to focus, the whole spot on the screen moves, and I have to move the entire machine in order to bring the light back.

I cannot say positively, but am of the opinion that before the machine went away one of the combinations was not screwed down tight into the barrel, and that when you cleaned the lens you, perhaps inadvertently, screwed it in, thus bringing the two lenses closer together, which has the effect of shortening the focal length of the lens and making the picture larger; it might also injure the definition. As to the other trouble, you will find it to be true to a greater or less extent in about ninety-nine motion picture objective lenses out of every hundred. It is due to the fact that the moving picture objectives are cheap lenses, and are not accurately mounted with relation to each other. If the front combination is either a trifle out of center in its mounting, or if it is the least bit out of square with the lens barrel, then revolving the lens barrel will move the light on the screen, and it takes a mighty little variation to cause this effect. For this reason a lens which is focused by revolving the barrel is unsuitable for projection work, particularly now that we are outlining the picture with black.

Excessive Light Bill.

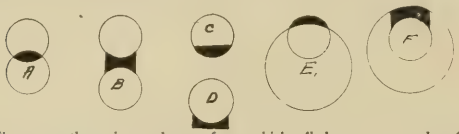
Oklahoma writes:

I am using 220 d. c. Was given charge of the place the first of February, and the month before, the light bill was $58.80. We only run two hours at night, and pay 10 cents per k.w. We do not even run on Sundays, and I think the bill is outrageous. What would you suggest? We use No. 14 galvanized wire for resistance.

My dear sir, if I are paying 10 cents per k.w. and are compelled to use 220 volt current I would (a) put in an isolated light plant with a 70 volt generator; (b) put in a d. c. to d. c. economizer, which friend Hallberg can provide you with. Under the conditions, however, my preference would be the light plant. Using 220 volt current through resistance is enormously wasteful—see page 123 of Handbook for explanation.

Lens.

W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, in setting the editor right on a criticism he made by mail sends the following drawing, which is so aptly illustrative that I publish it.



These are the primary lenses from which all lenses are made: (A) Double convex. (B) Double concave. (C) Plano convexo. (D) Plano concavo. (E) Concavo convex. (F) Convexo concave. Brother James then continues:

As they have all been peckin' on me, I went and turned my nanny loose, so here goes. On page 943, February 21st issue, Oakland, California, is positively wrong in his sketch. Supposing the condensers came to a true focus, which they cannot do on account of spherical aberration, what would happen? Why, they would cross, pass through the film and we would have the objective lens working on the back focus of the condenser light ray cone.

On page 943, same issue, the editor tells F. H. France, Bethany, Missouri, to use two 7½ condensers with a 5½ e. f. objective. If the lens measures 5½ inches on the particular conjugate foci at which it is working, then the following is the f. l. condensers he wants in his mount. I would advise him though to measure from the film to the center of the objective lens and let us know that measurement, as a 5½ inch e. f. may even be working at 4 inches e. f. or again it might be 7 inches e. f., depending upon the position of the conjugate foci at which it is working. Considering the measurement of "f" (object focus) of the conjugate to be 5¼ inches, then he would need a 7½ inch rear and 8½ inch front condenser. His arc crater should be 3¼ inches from the center of the combination. His condensers should have ¼ inch air gap between them at the poles of their convex surfaces. The aperture plate should be 13½ inches from the center of the condensers. His spot should measure 1¾ inches in diameter at the aperture plate.

As to answering the questions: Why hold them up longer? If you are going to run a Roll of Honor, let it be for the "men who know," not for the men who take four or five weeks to find the answer in a book. If they want to catch up, why didn't they study before?

As to John Griffith's condenser gauge, page 945, same issue, it is O. K. as far as it goes, but it is not close enough for accurate work. The reason I say this is that ¼ inch difference in the f. l. of one condenser on ⅛ inch difference in the light gap between the condensers will make a big differnce in the e. f. of the combination. Then again, if brother Griffith will try his gauge against the sun's ability he will find it is a long way off, as the gauge does not allow for imperfections in the molding of the condensers, or the difference in the refraction index of the glass in individual lenses.

Once again, let brother Griffith get himself a 7 inch virtual focus negative, and match it to one of the plano convex positives that his gauge calls 7 inches. I think he will find that instead of having a plain glass combination he will have a number of negative and positive lenses collectively, or, in other words, their combination would give him several images of the same object.

I don't see that any comment is necessary. Brother James has contributed a really magnificent piece of work on the action of light through projection lenses, and this will be published very soon. It is long and will probably have to be run serially. By the way, however, brother James doesn't seem to quite understand the idea of the questions. They are not primarily for the man who already knows, but are designed especially for the man who does not know. They are intended to direct the study of operators into profitable channels.

Home Telephone Wanted.

A. C. Stewart, late of Rossland, B. C., now proprietor of the Empire Theater, Waitsburg, Washington, writes as follows:

Enclosed find $2.00 for book on electricity. I cut two pieces of tin nearly as wide as the main blades of my Motiograph 1912 double cone shutter and riveted them to the interrupter blades. This reduces flicker very much and gave about as good result as could be secured with an outside two-wing shutter. After attaching the blades they must be painted a dead black. Will some fan come through with a scheme for a home-made telephone for connecting the operating room with the ticket office? The speaking tube idea is crude and clumsy, and I cannot afford the regular telephone sets. On page 147 and 148 of the Handbook, you say the more coils the primary contains with relation to the turns of the secondary the higher will be the voltage in the secondary. According to my figuring the reverse is the case.

I had not noticed this error, but you are quite correct. The less the number of turns in the secondary with relation to the turns in the primary the lower will be the secondary voltage. Don't know how the error ever got in, but it did. There was an illustrated telephone plan published last year in this department, if I remember rightly.

A Peculiar Proposition.

We are informed that Robert L. Moore, secretary of the educational department of the Y. M. C. A., presumably of Boston, has secured the services of Leroy L. Holden, an electrical engineer and a graduate of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and that the organization will open a school for operators, giving instructions Tuesday and Thursday nights for fifteen weeks, or thirty sessions. Mr. Holden is to be in charge of the "school." The Y. M. C. A. says: "The object of this course is to furnish a practical working knowledge of the exhibition end of motion pictures, and the electrical or scientific principles involved in the design and the operation of the cinematograph." Mr. Holden says that the field was never better for operators who know how to produce the best results on the screen. He adds that anyone who is willing to plug in order to thoroughly understand the details of the business is bound to succeed. He also states there is a great demand for reliable men today who know how to operate motion picture machines.

In the first place it seems to me as though the Y. M. C. A. is in a pretty small business. The editor of this department believes firmly and absolutely in the education of the operator, but, on the other hand, he does not believe in the production of more of the half-baked kind. The Y. M. C. A. has employed an instructor, whom we are told is an "electrical engineer," etc. Apparently he is not a practical operator; at least, the Y. M. C. A. does not say he is, and the fact that a man is an electrical engineer and a graduate of a college course by no manner of means implies that he is even within jumping distance of being able to teach motion picture operating, and, anyhow, when Mr. Holden or the Y. M. C. A. says there is a "great demand for reliable men who know how to operate moving picture machines" very decided liberties are taken with the truth. As a matter of fact there are two men for every job right now; that is, "reliable men who know how to operate moving picture machines", though on the other hand there is not one man for every fifty jobs who is a thoroughly high class operator. I am informed Mr. Holden has just received his operating license from the Boston authorities, also that it was necessary to send a Boston union operator to open the show for the Y. M. C. A. when they first put pictures on. The Y. M. C. A. could, in the judgment of this department, do things which would reflect a great deal more credit on it than its present action. Heaven knows we do not need any more "beginners," and the Y. M. C. A. will simply be taking money from men under conditions which come mighty close to false pretences, if they charge for the course, as I presume they do; if they don't charge, then they are still deceiving men into a belief that they will be fitted by this course to enter a field where there are lots of jobs at good salaries. It is true there are lots of positions at fairly good salaries for high class, careful moving picture operators, but there are no such positions for the novice who learns his "trade" in a thirty session school course. The market is already glutted with that kind.

The Standardization of Machine Apertures.

This department has, during the past four years, on many occasions called attention to the fact that it is a practical impossibility to order projection lenses with any certainty of their projecting the size picture which they are supposed to project at a given throw, partly by reason of the fact that the aperture plates of different manufacturers vary as to their width.

I am glad to be informed that the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, of Rochester, N. Y., has taken the matter of standardizing the aperture plate, and has secured the consent of the Nicholas Power Company and the Precision Machine Company to adopt an aperture opening 29-32 of an inch in width by 75 per cent. of that measurement in height. We therefore now have two leading manufacturers with the same aperture.

This department would strongly recommend to the Edison Manufacturing Co., the Enterprise Optical Co., and in fact all manufacturers of projection machines that they adopt 29-32 of an inch as the standard width for apertures.

The Gundlach-Manhattan people set forth seven reasons for the making of this change as follows:

(1) A standardized aperture removes one uncertain factor in determining the focal length of a lens required for a picture of a given size.

(2) When two machines of different kinds are in use matched lenses will make pictures of the same size, where otherwise a difference must be made in the focus of the lenses to obtain pictures of the equal size.

(3) When ordering lenses it will be unnecessary to give the name of the machine, often omitted, with a resulting delay in getting the order filled.

(4) Changing a lens from one machine to another will not make a difference in the size of the picture.

(5) By making the height of the hole exactly three-quarters of the width, the proper proportions of a screen of any size can be determined at a glance without a trifling little fraction to be considered which has heretofore been troublesome.

(6) When using two different machines matched lenses can be obtained to make pictures of equal size, so both pictures will fit the screen.

(7) One step towards simplifying the problem of supplying lenses to make the picture just the size wanted for such a wide range of operating conditions.

License.

C. H. Stanford, Kirkwood, New York, asks:

What will I have to do to become a licensed moving picture operator? If I have to take an examination, where can this be done?

You will have to be able to pass an examination as to your qualifications particularly on the electrical end of it. You can make application for examination in any city in New York which has a license law, or in Boston, Mass., where there is a state license law.

Poster-Smeared Fronts.

Greensboro, North Carolina, says:

There are three moving picture houses in High Point, a town of over 12,000. Two of them run straight pictures and one mixes in vaudeville. Concerning the vaudeville house I will say nothing, as I have not visited it for a year, but the other two plaster the fronts of their buildings with posters to such an extent that you cannot tell whether they are theaters or bill boards. There are so many posters that you cannot even tell what pictures they have on for that day, but must take a chance on seeing what you want to see. I recently counted twelve one-sheet posters on the front of one house. I was in both of these theaters and the projection was very good. In Greensboro we have two straight picture shows and one vaudeville picture house; projection is very good in all three.

I thoroughly and heartily agree with you, Greensboro, in the condemnation of poster plastered fronts. Making a billboard out of the front of a theater is not mere foolishness—it is rank idiocy. We have a few examples of this particular brand of solid-ivory-topped managers in New York, in our cheaper houses. Two or three, or even four neatly framed posters, either on the lobby wall or in an easel-supported frame are all right; anything more than this merely serves to cheapen the whole house, and draw away desirable patronage rather than attract it.

Generator Connection.

D. C. Doyle, Minden, Nebraska, says:

If you remember in my last letter I said I realized I did not know it all. Well, I have discovered, upon careful self examination, that I really only actually knew about one-tenth as much as I thought I did at that. When moving into the building vacated by my competitor my dynamo, through carelessness of the drayman, was dropped, and one of the arms on the brush holder was broken; also the brushes drove three of the commutator segments in about 1-64 of an inch. After the holder was welded and the commutator dressed down, the dynamo was put together and started, but the most it would develop at the required number of r.p.m. was 10 volts. I shipped it to Omaha, had it overhauled and it now works fine. The only change made, so far as I can see, was that the brush connections are different and the field wire has been shortened, and connected to the other side of the line. I also discovered the reason that the amperage was low was that the ammeter was loose on the board. Since it was tightened the arc pulls 25 amperes. The city is putting in a light plant which will furnish a.c. at 2,300 voltage. I am thinking of installing a motor to pull the dynamo, which is a 5 k.w., 44 ampere machine; the show uses 36 amperes. What h.p. should the motor be to pull the dynamo when direct connected?

As to the dynamo trouble, presumably you had the field coils reversed. If you had shifted your brushes and run the dynamo in the opposite direction, I presume all would have been well without changing the connections. As to the ammeter: why its being loose on the board would not affect the generation of current, or its flow, but the ammeter would not register correctly. In other words, you would have the amperage, but it might not show on the ammeter if it was badly out of level. I am assuming, of course, that the electrical connections were all tight. As to the motor: your generator develops 5,000 watts, you say, which is almost 7 h.p. However, you only purpose to use 36 amperes, and, since your generator is presumably a 110 volt machine, that would be only about 4,000 watts, or about 5½ h.p. I would, therefore recommend that you purchase a motor rated at 7 brake h.p. You could, of course, get along with a motor developing 5½ brake h.p., but it would be better to have some surplus. You must remember, however, that there is a lot of difference between "brake horse power" and just ordinary horse power rating. Insist on brake h.p. and you will know just exactly what you are getting.

An Explanation.

E. J. Wall, Professor of Photography, Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y., contributes the following, which sets the editor right on something which has puzzled him for a long time. I see I have been confused as to the meaning of the term "diffusion". No that is not exactly right either. I knew what the term diffusion meant all right, but was wrong in applying it to the film at the aperture. Friend Wall sets me right in this matter in the following most excellent form:

The condenser should not focus on the film. This does not give the maximum illumination. The rays do not begin to spread here. The rays are not broken up or diffused at this point by the film.

The first three points I hope to treat of soon in this department, but it is with the last statement but I now propose to deal. It is at once obvious that either there is a geat deal of confusion as to the meaning of the term "diffusion" or else ignorance of what diffusion actually is. This is obvious from the Editor's comment. (Easy with the whip there, old top.—Ed.) No transparent substance can diffuse light—if it could it would not be transparent, but translucent. A diffusing surface is one that scatters light in all directions, so that no definite outlines of an object can be seen through the same. Good examples are ground or opal glass or a piece of linen. These let through light, and are therefore "translucent", a word derived from "trans"—"through" and "lux"—light; while transparent is from "trans"—"through" and "pareo"—"to appear". All terms from the Latin.

Celluloid is transparent, and cannot diffuse the light. But what of the silver image? This simply stops out the light, or, in other words, absorbs it. Practically, if not celluliod be used, but merely a piece of wire netting be placed over the aperture, you have the fundamental idea of what the silver image does—it stops out some of the light and the objective projects the rest.

Theoretically and practically the image is composed of minute particles of opaque metallic silver, and these not only stop out the light, but also scatter it. that is to say each particle throws off a certain quantity of light in all directions, but—and this is a very important but—the main beam is partially stopped and partially transmitted. "Scatter" is totally different from "diffuse", and you can see through the silver image the shapes of objects. To prove this take the densest or blackest ground that you can find in a title, and look at the arc through it and you will see the crater and the carbons without any difficulty. Now try a piece of the finest ground glass that you can buy and you will see nothing but "diffused" light no definite shapes.

I do not know why I did not catch this simple little fact before, for I have thought of it literally hundreds of times. The grasping of this idea helps me very largely to understand things which I have never been able to line up with the diffusion idea, therefore Mr. Wall has the thanks of the editor as well as, I am sure, those of many of our readers. It means, among other things, that there is little or practically no lost light between a film and the lens if the condensers be properly fitted to the objective.

Operator Overcome.

A. J. Gilligham, manager Detroit Branch, of the General Film Company, sends in clippings from Adrian, Michigan, papers, which were sent to his office by E. M. Simons, manager of the New Family Theater, of that city. Mr. Gilligham remarks: "The clippings at least show that the Adrian operator keeps his eyes on the pictures." The various clippings set forth the fact that the Lenawee County Medical Association met in Adrian recently, and that among the amusements and benefits prepared for them was the presentation of motion pictures at one of the local theaters. Among these were pictures showing some difficult surgical operations, and in some cases these were about as horrifying to the uninitiated as could be well imagined. Suddenly the picture ceased, right in the middle of a scene. Investigation developed the fact that the operator, Cassius Kaiser by name, had flopped over in a faint brought about by the realistic pictures he was projecting.

Nothing Doing.

A. B. Arnett, Midway, Kentucky, wants to know how soon the next booklet of questions will be ready. He also suggests that I publish the whole series of questions together with their answers in book form.

I cannot say just when the second book of questions will be ready. As to publishing the questions and their answers in book form—nothing doing. I am doing this in order to direct the studies of operators into profitable channels, but a publication of the kind you suggest would be something altogether different again, and, in my judgment, not at all good. I do not want to provide a list of questions together with the answers which may be carried around in the pocket and learned by heart. I want to provide you with a list of questions to study, the study of which will be beneficial, and in order to make this effective I must of necessity publish the answers, so that you can check up your own work. I don't, however, care to put the two together.

Kingman, Kansas.

Kingman, Kansas, arises to remark:

Have not seen this town mentioned in the department, therefore I butt in. Your reply to New Haven's question, January 21st issue, as to not using hard carbons for a. c., I want to say that by setting the lower carbon about ⅛ of an inch forward, so as to force the crater farther back, you can use a solid carbon and a cored carbon on a. c. I think the questions are a very good stunt and that you will keep them up.

Well, I don't know Kingman. You would have to show me that particular stunt in operation. Possibly you are right, but if you will forgive me, my dear boy, I don't believe it. That is to say, I do not believe you can get good results with hard carbons below when using a. c.

Union ?????

Harry Martin, Boston, Massachusetts, writes:

It may be of interest to the trade to know that a Moving Picture Operators' Union was formed in Boston, and chartered by the Knights of Labor on the first day of January, 1914. The organization is known as the Moving Picture Operators' Assembly of Boston, No. 3030, and has established headquarters at 181 Tremont Street.

I cannot agree with friend Martin that this is an "Operators' Union." It is not. The Knights of Labor have no right, under the laws and rules of oragnized labor, to charter an operators' union. Boston operators are organized in Local Union No. 182, I. A. T. S. E., and this is the only organization of Boston operators which can rightly be called a "union."

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

THE LOVE ROUTE, VIA PITTMAN (Essanay), March 24.—A nice little comedy that is well worked out with the exception of minor details, which the layman probably overlooks. There is nothing in it improbable, and some incidents that are likely to occur every day. It contains several good, legitimate and natural comedy situations that gain hearty laughter; also scenes of sympathy and sentiment. It is finely produced and acted.

STRANGE SEA WATER CREATURES (Pathe), March 24.—Another educational picture, giving an idea of the strange creatures that live in the depths of the sea; one can scarcely realize that such creatures exist. Photography good.

WORKADAY SCENES IN A FLOWERY LAND (Pathe), March 24.—On the same reel with "Trichinopoly." It gives the spectator some ideas of the "Flowery Land" with the habits and industries of the inhabitants.

TRICHINOPOLY, INDIA (Pathe), March 24.—This is an educational as well as an interesting picture, showing the busy streets, crowded with people in strange costumes, also the curiously constructed temples and pagodas.

A DEAL IN REAL ESTATE (Lubin), March 24.—A peculiar and original method is adopted in this picturepiay to depreciate the value of real estate, by a skin-flint deacon. It involves a number of people and keeps them all in hot water for a time, but eventually ends with the skin-flint deacon being forced to eat humble pie. A young couple is made happy in the finale. It is a good clean plot and the picture is well done.

IN REMEMBRANCE (Selig), March 24.—The plot of this pictureplay is above the average and carries with it a lesson, not only to girls, but to wives and husbands. It depicts the weakness of a man and the faithfulness of a true and loving wife. The ending is eminently satisfactory. The husband is brought to a realization of his foolishness and his wife made happy. In every respect it is a good offering in the denouement.

BORROWED FINERY (Edison), March 24.—Those who appreciate a story that contains elements of sentiment with threads of comedy permeating through the plot will enjoy this picture of theatrical life, for it is filled with a seasoning of humanity. It is not void of interest either. It evidences the fact that good heartedness still exists, both among the high and lowly in life. The innate longings of a poor little crippled girl furnish the theme. It is a good picture to see, for young and old.

THE HALL ROOM RIVALS (Vitagraph), March 25.—Josie Sadler appears in this number as a widow in charge of an apartment house. Two old salts aspire to her hand, but are both left in the shuffle when her real lover appears. The characterizations are excellent and the story, though somewhat slight, runs along entertainingly.

BRIDGET BRIDGES IT (Essanay), March 25.—This is an amusing little comedy number, in which Robert Bolder appears as the washerwoman who goes to a reception on an invitation intended for another. She wins an automobile at bridge. A unique plot with several good laughs in it.

A NIGHT OUT (Edison), March 25.—This comedy number is based on a familiar plot, in which the two husbands get their overcoats mixed up and the contents of the pockets arouse much jealousy. Dan Mason, May Abbey, Edward O'Connor and Cora Williams are in the cast. An old subject handled with spirit and containing quite a lot of genuine amusement.

WHILE WIFIE IS AWAY (Selig), March 25.—Dodd, wishing to get up a poker game while his wife is away, pretends to be very ill and asks his friends in. The developments of the evening make a diverting half-reel subject. This is well acted and nicely pictured.

DOC YAK, THE POULTRYMAN (Selig), Mach 25.—A number of animated drawings by Sidney Smith, showing his well known character, Doc Yak, in the chicken business. On same reel with above.

WHIFFLES' NEW PROFESSION (Pathe), March 25.—A comedy half-reel in which Whiffles visits a swell hotel and pretends his trousers have been stolen. This is novel and well-pictured.

OLD STREETS OF CAIRO (Pathe), March 25.—An interesting series of views taken in the famous Egyptian city, showing camels, carts, natives, an Arabian bazaar and other features of the life there. On the same reel with above.

BATTY BILL'S ROUGH HOUSE (Melies), March 26.—This half-reel gives, as the title indicates, a genuine rough house. Bill's domicile is almost torn down by the girl's irate uncle, who smashes furniture and valuable ornaments. A good example of eccentric French comedy.

HANDSOME HARRY'S WOOING (Melies), March 26.—This, on same reel with above, is also amusing. The girl's aunt saves her from an unwelcome suitor by throwing a fit occasionally and making him believe it is a family trait. The subtitles are long but very well written.

CHANLER RAO, CRIMINAL EXPERT (Vitagraph), March 26.—A mystery story, in which the Hindu magician, out of gratitude to his physician, discovers who stole the diamond cluster ring. The plot is unique and has an air of mystery about it that holds the attention of an audience closely. This is new and entertaining.

CUPID'S CAPRICE (Selig), March 26.—The girl who walked in her sleep unconsciously threw suspicion on her maid which afterward proved unjust. Both the interior and wood scenes in this little comedy number are attractive and the photography is good. The love story is pleasing, though light in plot.

THE ATONEMENT (Essanay), March 26.—There is very little plot to this picture, but the situations in it are more interesting than those in the average Western offering. The sheriff's daughter, reverting to an inherited instinct, steals the traveler's money, but later makes restitution to save her father. Reina Valdez plays the part of the conscience-stricken girl very nicely; Carl Stockdale and Lee Willard have the leading male parts.

NEVER SHIRK (Biograph), March 26.—The slight idea in this half-reel does not draw forth much laughter. The photography is good and it proves fairly entertaining.

WIFEY'S VISIT HOME (Biograph), March 26.—This, on same reel with above, has numerous funny spots. The sporty father has a good time at the beach until he is forced to wear a dress. Good photography and plenty of action make this a pleasing offering.

AND THE VILLAIN STILL PURSUED HER (Kalem), March 27.—A clever and amusing offering. It is the old melodrama burlesqued in a fresh and bright way by Ruth and John Brennan and makes an enjoyable bit of entertainment.

PHOSPHATE MINING (Kalem), March 27.—On the same reel with the foregoing, this industrial has a good lesson for farmers and makes a good argument for the product put out by the Florida phosphate people. It is clearly photographed.

THE PURITAN (Lubin), March 27.—There is some fine photography in this picture. The story is commercial without freshness or convincing truth; it is very like several others of the poorer kind of pictures that have dealt with this kind of character. The acting, especially of the titular character, is weak to emptiness. The girl does her part well; but is not able to make up for the picture's deficiencies. The script is by Emmet Campbell Hall and was produced by John Ince.

THE STORY OF CUPID (Selig), March 27.—Roman mythology and modern life are mixed in this picture's melodrama which, although ridiculous to people of understanding, will appeal as a very pretty conceit to many spectators. To begin with, a figure of Cupid dissolves into Frank Newberg which is a bit amusing. Then we find others of the Roman theogony becoming real folks of the Selig stock and playing the melodrama which is not in any mythology. The camera work in making the dissolving scenes is awkward in the extreme. Yet, as an offering for most places, we dare call it very fair, on account of the newness of it more than anything else.

MILLIONS FOR DEFENSE (Vitagraph), March 27.—Marc E. Jones, the author, had his nerve with him (we are inclined to commend him for it) when he wrote this script. It didn't seem to get over at first, but the more we watched it, the more amusing it became. The situation is full of farcical spirit and, while not a complete success, it gets over enough to make a good offering. No one would care to see such a picture twice. Ulysses Davis is the producer and Myrtle Gonzales with William D. Taylor have the leads.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 13 (Selig), March 28.—A topic showing interesting scenes in various parts of the world.

THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA (Lubin), March 28.—On the same reel as "Detective Short," this is the animated cartoon sort exploiting the adventures of passengers and crew in a submarine.

DETECTIVE SHORT (Lubin), March 28.—The leading character is played by a diminutive comedian who is rather clever. The scenes are laid in a country town, and rube policemen and other impossible rubes make up the cast. It is a burlesque comedy. Received a few laughs.

A LEAP FOR LIFE (Kalem), March 28.—A very exciting photoplay of railroad life concerning a strike of firemen. It is weak in the fact that union engineers, brakemen and conductors will not work with strikebreakers, as is shown here. Nevertheless, not analyzing too closely, it is a strong and gripping offering. The railroad scenes, with which the picture is filled, are wonderfully done, and the heroism the father exhibits in capturing a wild freight to save a passenger train ahead, containing his daughter, is very effective. A finely directed and acted picture.

BRONCHO BILLY'S TRUE LOVE (Essanay), March 28.—There is little plot to this picture. It seems to be made up of incidents and lacks the usual "put-over" qualities that imbue Mr. Anderson's work usually. It has one redeeming feature well illustrated—unselfishness. It is good in moral tone and well produced and acted.

PUTTING ONE OVER (Edison), March 28.—This is fourth of Dolly of the Dailies series, and is a clever offering. Dolly gets a scoop for her, paper by impersonating the president of a social settlement. She gets a five thousand dollar check for the settlement also, and a grasping, unscrupulous realty company into a mess of trouble. It is interesting and well done.

THE DOCTOR'S TRUST (Biograph), March 30.—A very interesting picture with the plot located among high-class professional people. A profligate son is suspected of a robbery, but is redeemed in the finale. It is a meritorious number, and is well done in every respect.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 26, 1914 (Pathe), March 30.—A topical review of scenes all over the world that highly entertains the spectators.

THE VISION IN THE WINDOW (Edison), March 30.—The fourth of the Wood B. Wedd series. This offering is a laugh producing vehicle, and the characters are all finely rendered. William Wadsworth, who is so susceptible to female charms that he strenuously makes love to a manikin, believing it to be a human being. This is a laughable offering and well done in every detail.

THE SILVER SNUFF BOX (Vitagraph), March 30.—A story located in Russia environment that is gripping and that involves in its plot characters indigenous to that country. Intrigue and revenge seem to be the main features dominant in this picture. It is interesting, however, and holds the audience to the denouement.

Licensed Special

HER HUSBAND (Vitagraph), March 24.—A two-part picture that has considerable interest through the plot, but portrays in several scenes situations that are unpleasant to view. The character of the husband, the scion of a worthy and prominent family, is shown to be utterly devoid of all the conventions of social and domestic life. Ingratitude seems to be his best quality, and dissipation his ambition. His wife clings to him, condoning his faults. Clara Young is the wife and her acting is natural and artistic. This offering holds the audience to the end. No fault can be found with the direction and acting.

THE BARBER OF SEVILLE (Ambrosio), March 24.—This three-reel photoplay has been visualized evidently from both the comedy of Beaumarchais, and the opera of Rossini. It is a very amusing offering. The actor who portrays the part of Figaro, the title-role, is a graceful, accomplished and artistic comedian, and is ably supported. The costuming is adequate, and the direction and photography merit the highest praise. It is a deserving sequel to the "Marriage of Figaro" recently released.

ABOVE THE LAW (Lubin), March 25.—A two-reel number, written by Shannon Fife. May and Jim are mountain lovers, when Paul Hunt, a New York crook appears. The accident of the falling tree was well put on. During his convalescence the city man woos the girl and finally marries her and takes her to the city. Here she learns the truth. This plot has been done innumerable times, but it is here particularly well handled. The characterizations and incidents are all interesting. The meeting of the father and daughter in court was dramatic and pleasing. A strong story of its type.

THE REFRIGERATOR CAR'S CAPTIVE (Kalem), March 25.—A two-reel number, combining fruit-growing with railroading. The hero deals in fruit and many of the opening scenes are taken in an orchard. His rival in love contrives to cripple his business and toward the close locks him in a refrigerator car which is allowed to run wild. The rescue scene was well put on. The story as a whole does not touch any exceptionally high plane of interest, but it works up entertainingly and is well constructed throughout.

THE GAME OF POLITICS (Lubin), March 26.—This two-reel offering gives a realistic view of one side of the political game. It has a pathetic close, showing the death of the "glad hand" youth who was thrust into the position of fixer for a campaign manager. This is something new in the way of a political story and carries with it a good insight into campaign methods. The part of Dick was particularly well played by Wm. Campbell. This is well constructed and pleasingly presented throughout.

THE CONSTANCY OF JEANNE (Pathe), March 26.—This two-part story is artistic and has a wealth of attractive settings. The scenes along the coast and in the rural village were particularly enjoyable. The story also is bright and entertaining, with a romantic flavor that appeals to the observer. Jeanne's love for Jacques remains true in spite of the artist's efforts to win her heart, and in spite of the fact that she thinks the sailor lad is dead. The close is a happy one. A pleasing offering.

THE THREE SCRATCH CLUE (Essanay), March 27.—In this two-part special a gentleman crook (they seldom are interesting) nearly breaks up a love affair; for the girl finds him attractive. The story is essentially unconvincing. We are not induced to believe that this crook could, in just this easy manner, worm his way into the friendship of the old book collector and his daughter. It is not diamonds that the crook is after but a $50,000 book which one wonders at and this doesn't add to the story's seeming truth. There is some good photography and very fair acting in the offering.

THE BRASS BOWL (Edison), March 27.—A two-part picture from the story of Louis Joseph Vance. It is not so vivid or so convincing as the story which took more time to fill in and explain—it is just such a story as would make a four reeler. The reviewer feels that if he had not read the story he would have thought more of the picture which, although it surely fails to convince strongly, tells a good tale and will furnish entertainment. The acting which entails the playing of two characters by the same actor, Ben Wilson, is commendable if not at any time brilliant.

NEVER AGAIN (Vitagraph), March 28.—A two-part farcical comedy that is cleverly and legitimately acted. Anthony E. Willis is the author and Sidney Drew gallivants through the scenes with his usual unction that causes continual laughter. This is a legitimate farce—not a burlesque, with impossible characters, as so many would-be comic "things" contain, that are foisted upon the people recently. The photography and direction deserve mention. The support rendered by the cast is thoroughly adequate. Mr. Drew is in a class by himself.

A LEECH OF INDUSTRY (Pathe), March 28.—This special release, in three reels was reviewed at length by Mr. Stephen Bush and can be found on page 1658, issue of March 28, 1914. Coinciding with Mr. Bush, it is a wonderful production.

A PASSOVER MIRACLE (Kalem), March 30.—This pictureplay has been reviewed at length on page 1369, issue of March 14, 1914.

Independent

A PARCELS POST AUTO (Apollo), March 22. A Fred Mace picture that is slight but moderately amusing. The leading man, in the role of Farmer Tight Wad, buys an inexpensive motor car and has some comical experiences running it or failing to make it run. The car used in the picture is a new kind and may especially interest people of moderate means who want to drive their own car. As an offering it is all right.

BY PERSEVERANCE AND PERSUASION (Joker), March 25.—After the usual style of the rough comedy offering or slap-stick methods. There are few laughs in it. There is a great amount of strenuous work indulged in that goes for naught. The method used by the suitor to bring the girl's father to terms is very original.

BEAUTIFUL SNOW (Princess), March 27.—A snow picture of good times in the country and played by a big, four horse sleigh full of merry people. The story, slight at best, is obscure until near the end. It has a good deal of broad humor that is unconvincing and, as far as we can see, of little value, tumbles, and the like, of players one after another, all choosing rocks to fall over with a good path close by.

A MISTAKEN WATCH (Royal), March 28.—The watch was not wrong as to time; but it was taken wrongly, therefore "mistaken." The fun comes from the players as much as from the situation; but there is good stuff in it and it will make laughter. In kind, it will remind spectators of the usual Lubin split reels.

THE BELLBOY'S REVENGE (Royal), March 28.—On the same reel with the foregoing and resembling it in the peculiar quality of the work, this broad farcical picture will also make laughter and be enjoyed by many.

WHEN SORROW FADES (Thanhouser), March 29.—A young lady, whose heart goes out in sympathy with an old couple who are devoid of the necessities of life, pleads with her fiance to aid her in interesting a newspaper in their behalf. He refuses, and she takes the matter into her own hands. The newspaper takes the matter up with her and the editor readily. The picture is clean, interesting and faithfully done in all respects.

THE BATTLE OF CHILI AND BEANS (Apollo), March 29.—This is a broad burlesque or farcical comedy—or an imitation of the Mexican war. Fred Mace is the perpetrator and gets suitably punished for his temerity as the last scene fades out and he fades with it.

A BACK YARD THEATER (Keystone), March 30.—Without telling any story, this picture by the Keystone kiddies has plenty of freshness of incident and will make a serviceable offering; it will please and be popular everywhere. It is a quite ingeniously contrived picture.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 11 (Reliance), March 30.—This follows the usual lines of the series regarding hats, dresses, etc. She meets Blanch Ring who invites her to come and see her performance. She does so. Later she imitates Miss Ring in her dances with the chorus.

SWEET LAND OF LIBERTY (Beauty), March 31.—The trouble with such pictures as this is that the action they set forth claims, by its nature, to be typical whereas it is not truthfully so. The spectator knows this and fails to be interested or pleased. It is pretty well acted and shows us how Fillipa, an Italian, is put in prison for taking care of a little lost girl. His wife arrives from Italy, can't find him, has hard luck and meets Fillipo in prison.

THE SPIDER'S WEB (Majestic), March 31.—This picture is of the conventional type where the husband neglects his wife, and she, in pique concludes to make a fool of herself in retaliation. She succeeds in getting herself into the clutches of the spider; so known because he purchases compromising letters from servants who purloin them. A parallel plot works through concerning an ex-convict who saves her from disaster through gratitude, for a favor which makes this picture very interesting.

VICTIMS OF SPEED (Komic), April 1.—Radium elixir, discovered by Prof. Nutt, affects all who touch it; wakes them up and makes them do things. The picture is lively; but its humor is broad and there is more motion than action in it. A rough offering for the gallery.

THE VANDERBILT CUP RACE, SANTA MONICA, CAL. (Komic), April 1.—On same reel is a picture of the speedy racing automobiles in which the photography is hardly better than fair.

THE BLOOD TEST (Imp), April 2.—This two-reel photoplay contains originality if it is faulty in some other respects. It is well acted by the entire cast—especially Mr. Baggot. There is a denseness in the plot, also in the photography that will puzzle the ordinary spectator; the lighting or camera work is spasmodic. The invention of the hero is not made clear to the layman, and the blood test is too abrupt and is hardly interesting. Some of the titles are misplaced evidently. It will go with people who visualize only.

GRANDDADDY AND GRANDDAUGHTER (Victor), April 3.—A very original plot is comprised in this pictureplay which amuses and entertains. It is clean in theme also, which is a redeeming feature. The picture is well made and contains several snow scenes, which are rare in pictures and a rarity is very welcome. The denouement is pleasing and amusing. The acting is adequate and photography good.

THE WARNING CRY (Majestic), April 3. An appealing plot and also a gripping one in several scenes. A beautiful young lady loses her voice through fright caused by discovering a burglar in her home, and regains it when her fiance's life is in danger. This offering is finely acted by principals and support.

THE TIN SOLDIER AND THE DOLL (Thanhouser), April 5.—The Kidlet's dolls come to life while she dreams and, played by other Thanhouser people, act a story of love and jealousy to a tragic end, when the blond, heroine-doll falls off the bed and wakes Kidlet. This little player is a treasure and gives just the touch to the picture that it needs to make it go well. A very pretty offering, artistically set and beautifully photographed.

APOLLO FRED SEES THE POINT (Apollo), April 5. Fred Mace with others acts comic characters for the fun of such as haven't seen too many of the same kind. Our experience with audiences makes us count it an acceptable offering.

THE LADY DOCTOR (Crystal), April 5.—Pearl White tries her hand in the familiar part of the woman physician. Some of the situations are merely nonsensical and some of them very funny. We think most anybody would enjoy seeing her experiments with the fat lady, the thin lady, Mr. Tremble and other patients. Good eccentric comedy.

IN AN OLD TRUNK (Eclair), April 5.—In this offering a company of bright, well-drilled children put on a burlesque drama. The actress, the negro maid, the playwright and the manager were all well interpreted, and the production as a whole is one that will prove very pleasing, particularly to women and children.

THE BABIES' DOLL (Rex), April 5.—A pathetic little offering, with Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber in the cast. The poor little girl stays out in a heavy rain storm to stand guard over a doll belonging to her friend. She dies as a result of the exposure. The story is full of human interest and is one that will be remembered.

UNIVERSAL IKE HAS HIS UPS AND DOWNS (Universal Ike), April 7.—Augustus Carney and Louise Glaum appear in another ranch comedy. This has a burlesque turn and the photography is fair. The attempt to frustrate the elopement was funny and the scenes toward the close of this number are better than the usual offering of the kind. On the whole the production is quite pleasing.

GET OUT AND GET UNDER (Crystal), April 7.—Quite a pleasing half-reel story of two young married people who think some friends are sending them an automobile. It turns out to be a sewing machine. Their adventures with a rented car bring numerous smiles.

AN UNDESIRABLE SUITOR (Crystal), April 7.—This, on same reel with above, shows how two young people bring the girl's father to time by threatening to kill themselves. Only fairly amusing.

A HAPPY COERCION (American), April 8.—Primarily a love story of an old maid and bachelor, the picture has a touch of liveliness in it that makes it a good offering. Clever, breezy and bright in its main situation, it gets over well and will be enjoyed by all. The photography is good.

A GYPSY ROMANCE (Nestor), April 8.—Wallace Reid produces this picture and in it plays the lead, supported by Dorothy Davenport. The action is melodramatic, there is much of physical encounter; the interest is not strong.

PRETZEL'S BABY (Frontier), April 9.—Rough farcical stuff with the usual characters. The eccentric camera work helps it; but it is rather slight in true fun value.

WHEN THERE'S A WILL, THERE'S A WAY (Imp), April 9.—Ethel Grandin and Hobart Henley appear in this as a young couple who must be married in order to obtain an inheritance. This plot has been used before in a slightly different form, so far as the rented apartment is concerned. This time it is cleverly handled and makes an appealing little love story.

THE SECOND CLUE (American), April 10.—Western detective story. Its threads are somewhat tangled and it fails to convince one of its likelihood. But it is full of stir. In acting and photography it stands well.

HER MOONSHINE LOVER (Nestor), April 10.—An agreeable comedy number, burlesquing the old-fashioned "moonshiner" story. Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde and Lee Moran combine forces to stir up considerable fun. The fall of the suspension bridge was well contrived.

IN THE CLUTCH OF CIRCUMSTANCE (Joker), April 11.—Max Asher and company here appear in a low comedy number, in which he finds a buried treasure. There is a marked improvement in the costuming of this company and this number as a whole is more attractive than former offerings. The humor is of an eccentric, burlesque type.

SHULTZ, THE PAPER HANGER (Joker), April 11.—This photoplay has been written from the plot of a vaudeville sketch, but has been elaborated with scenes made possible by the camera. It is of the rough and tumble character, overacted, and filled with absurd stunts to cause laughter. There are two or three funny ones that creep in, but the picture as a whole is overdone and ridiculous.

POISON (Frontier), April 11.—A Western picture-drama which is imbued with a morbidity that is far from pleasing as regards the plot. The utter disregard of illustrating dishonesty and ingratitude is questionable, especially when it makes an innocent child responsible for a murder. There is no excuse.

THE END OF THE FEUD (Rex), April 12.—A mountain feud story that works up into some gripping situations. Pauline Bush, Murdock MacQuarrie and Lon Chaney are among those appearing. Some excellent scenic effects heighten the interest of the film. The story is old in subject matter, but handled in a convincing manner.

LOST, STRAYED OR STOLEN (Crystal), April 12.—This is a low comedy offering, the scenes taking place in a theatrical boarding house. Vivian Prescott and Charlie De Forrest play the leads. The humor is not of a high type, but the characterizations are good and it is quite a diverting film of its kind. The duel scene was most amusing.

Independent Specials

THE SMUGGLERS OF SLIGO (Reliance), March 28.—A two-part story of smuggling with a touch of romance and set along the seashore, ostensibly, the Irish coast. We dare not call it an entire success, for the plot fails to set the action before us with anything like "punch," and the whole of it could have been as well told in even less than a thousand feet. In the two reels it is a bit slow. The producer is Wm. Christie Cabanne. The photography in many scenes is perfect, and is passable in all.

REPENTANCE (Thanhouser), March 31.—This is a two-reel picture. The first reel concerns two partners. It is rather irrational, but for the sake of sensation, presumably, the author and director go to the limit of their license. The story at the finale teaches a moral. The characters are well portrayed and the pictures are bright and well posed.

THE SQUIRE'S SON (Kay-Bee), April 3.—A two-part Irish melodrama with little real Irish spirit. There are two or three fine situations in it; but they have not been made wholly convincing and so are only partially effective. The characters are quite conventional and the picture keeps reminding one of something better than itself. The fact that it is well staged helps it as entertainment. The photography is of good quality. A fair commercial offering.

OUT OF THE FAR EAST (Imp), April 6.—This photoplay, written by Stuart Paton, is another tale of a sacred gem stolen in the Orient and brought to America. The possessor is visited with all manner of weird experiences. Leah Baird plays the part of the girl. There is nothing particularly new about this yarn, but it is well constructed and has a number of dramatic moments. The settings are not exceptional.

LIKE FATHER, LIKE SON (American), April 6.—This offering in two reels deals in plot and theme with the heredity question. It is a good illustration of the sins of a father being visited on the son. Much anguish is portrayed, and a lesson taught. A well acted and good all-round picture.

THE MYSTERY OF THE WHITE CAR (Gold Seal), April 7.—This is the third of the My Lady Raffles series, written by Grace Cunard, who plays the leading role, assisted by Francis Ford and others. This particular number is well pictured. It is ultra-mysterious and there are a number of surprising appearances and disappearances on the part of the fascinating villainess who drives the white automobile. The scenes occur on the Mexican border and are full of action and excitement of an enjoyable sort. This is the best of this series so far shown.

SHORTY'S SACRIFICE (Broncho), April 8.—This is a two-reel picture that visualizes a good clean motive in its plot—a boy's love for his mother, for whose sake he undergoes many dangers and hardships; even risking his life. In the end he comes out triumphant and is instrumental in restoring her to health and happiness. A splendid number that is well done. Shorty's adventures, as filmed, do not lack in excitement.

THE DRUG TRAFFIC (Eclair), April 8.—A two-reel number, with Stanley Walpole, Alec Francis and Belle Adair in the cast. This is the now familiar story of the young man who discovers that his own father is manufacturer of habit-forming drugs. His sweetheart becomes a victim to a headache cure. While this has been done before in pictures, it is here presented with unusual force, and the photography is clear. The scenes are of course of a far from cheerful nature, but the film carries a strong lesson to people who are prone to indulge in patent medicines, and its mission is a worthy one.

THE RUBY CIRCLE (Rex), April 9.—A two-reel offering, featuring Robert Leonard and Hazel Buckham. The young clubman finds the ruby ring a passport to a Nihilist meeting. The piece contains mystery, love and an agreeable flavor of melodrama. It will serve to please the average audience. The bomb scene has done yeoman service, but was handled very satisfactorily here.

JOLIET PRISON, JOLIET, ILL. (Abo), March.—This four-reel, State right, educational picture shows the daily routine of the Illinois penitentiary, known as the "Model Prison." It emulates the complete interior and exterior workings in every detail. It takes a criminal through his daily life from his incarceration to his discharge. Numberless scenes in the different workshops and the methods adopted in the manufacture of shoes, chairs, brooms, brushes, etc., and the humane manner in which each is conducted is both gratifying and interesting. The scenes in the kitchen and dining room show utmost cleanliness. Simple games are indulged in, such as pitching quoits, etc. Scenes illustrating chapel services and the marches thereto, and to and fro from their cells show that the old lock step has been relegated to oblivion; also the striped suits are not used, except in extreme cases. Scenes at Mount Hope, where the convicts are allowed to work without guards, are elucidated. This is a very well made offering.

THROUGH FIRE AND FLAMES (Lewis Pennant Features), March.—A three-reel picture featuring a graceful dancer who is beautifully photographed in several costumes, is charming in all of them; is, in fact, the chief thing in the offering. The story is the merest framework on which the dancing is shown. It ought to go very fairly, especially in theaters where a vaudeville act would be acceptable.

WON IN THE CLOUDS (Universal Special), March.—This splendid three-reel number, written and produced by Otis Turner, appeals to the imagination. It is an adventure story, clean-cut and full of atmosphere. It runs like one of the romances of H. Rider Haggard combined with a Jules Verne novel. The manner in which the airship invades a native village in Africa makes the best kind of an adventure yarn—all well pictured and convincing. A desirable release.

RICHELIEU (Universal Special Feature), March.—A six-reel production of the celebrated story of Cardinal Richelieu, following the lines of the famous play by that name. Murdock MacQuarrie appears as the Cardinal and Pauline Bush as Jule De Mortemar, his ward. Allan Dwan is the producer. There are some good characterizations in this and some that seemed inadequate. The plot is a highly interesting one toward the close, but the action in the first three reels is rather slow and confusing. This would have been much stronger as either a three or four reel production. Not a thoroughly artistic production, but one on which much care and thought have been expended.

THE TRIUMPH OF RIGHT (Punchfilm).—This four-part subject is being exploited by the Pan-American company. The story can hardly be classed as a pleasant one; furthermore, it is put together with a disregard for the probabilities. When the overvillainous villain photographs the wife of his employer in the company of a man friend he makes no pretense of concealing himself from their view. The villain, by the way, overacts throughout. The portrayer of the husband is a competent actor and makes much of his part. There is an explosion in the second reel, which contributes a bit of sensationalism. In the final reel there is a duel in the dark between the husband and the man whose almost unbelievable jealousy-inspired villainy caused his wife to leave her home fifteen years before. The husband kills his opponent. The settings are stagey; the photography is uneven at times.

WIFEY'S CHARMS (Punchfilm).—A four-part subject being exploited by the Pan-American Company. The picture is essentially a European and a non-American production—that is, it was made in Europe and for the European market. It is a comedy in its intent; but its value comes from its suggestiveness and from its ultra-burlesque stage action—notably the bathtub scene, or again the attempt of the husband to break into the room of his peevish wife, appareled for bed; or yet again the attempt of the husband to restrain the escape of the scantily clad wife through the door of the divorce court room. There are well photographed bathing scenes at a resort where the women use the one-piece suit. The picture certainly is for adult audiences, of the sort that most do congregate in burlesque theaters.

Photographic Dealers' Convention.

Members Show Great Interest In Motion Picture Apparatus —Big Kinematographic Display.

By G. P. von Harleman.

THE Photographic Dealers' Association of America held their second annual convention at the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, March 25th to March 27th, inclusive. There were delegates from almost every State in the Union and representatives even from England, Germany, France and Canada.

One of the most notable features of the convention was the large display of motion picture cameras, projecting machines and other kinematographic accessories. This is rather significant. The photographic supply dealer is beginning to appreciate certain possibilities for himself in the moving picture line and realize that the time may not be very far off when a picture machine will be as common a fixture in a home as a talking machine. A modified machine, of course, at a moderate price and fireproof. The manufacturers of kinematographic machinery are working on this problem and realize quite well that the thousands of photographic dealers throughout the country would be the most adaptable to successfully handle this proposition. Even at the present stage of the game, it is to the interest of the photographic dealer to keep in touch with the manufacturers of moving picture machines and cameras. Quite a few professional outfits are sold through photographic dealers to customers who either think it's more convenient or otherwise are unfamiliar with the regular moving picture trade.

Among the great number of photographic exhibits at the Chicago convention, the following concerns were displaying motion picture apparatus or literature pertaining thereto: Burke & James, Inc., Chicago, agents for the Urban Bioscope cameras and Voigtlander and Dallmeyer lenses; Ernemann Photo-Kino Works, New York, American agents for Ernemann cameras and the "Imperator" projecting machine, represented at the Chicago convention by H. J. Hoffman; The Precision Machine Company, New York, manufacturer of the "Simplex" projection machine, represented by G. S. Bothwell; Nicholas Power Company, New York, manufacturer of the Powers Cameragraph, represented by W. C. Smith and L. W. Atwater; Motion Picture Apparatus Company, New York City, agents for "Prestwich" Kino-Kameras and kinematographic accessories, represented by R. Hastings; Photo Cines Company, New York City, manufacturers of kinematographic cameras and accessories, represented by A. E. Campbell; G. Gennert, New York City, agent for the "Ensign" line of cameras and kinematographic apparatus, also "Austin Edward's" kinematographic film, represented by G. Gennert; Meyer Camera & Instrument Company, New York City, agents for the "Mamey" home moving picture projector represented by Max Meyer; Bell & Howell Company, Chicago, manufacturers of kinematographic cameras and accessories, represented by F. M. Ryan; H. C. White Company, North Bennington, Vt., manufacturers of enlarging and projecting apparatus, represented by C. W. White; Pathescope Company, Chicago and New York, agents for the "Pathescope" home projector and amateur camera, represented by F. Reno, Wm. R. Shipman and M. O. Evans; Victor Animatograph Company, Davenport, Iowa, manufacturers of the "Victor Animatograph," represented by S. G. Rose and F. B. Schnell; McIntosh Stereopticon Company, Chicago, manufacturers of stereopticons and accessories, represented by M. A. Bassere and H. T. Price; Bausch & Lomb Optical Company, Rochester, N. Y., manufacturers of photographic lenses of every description, represented by I. L. Nixon, E. A. Taylor and C. A. Bengston; Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, manufacturers of photographic lenses and various other photographic accessories, represented by Henry H. Turner and Harry M. R. Glover; C. P. Goerz & Co., New York City, manufacturers of lenses and photographic apparatus, represented by W. C. Smith, and Berlin Aniline Works, New York City, American office of the "Agfa" products, represented by Geo. D. Barrows.

Considerable interest was displayed by the dealers in the various home moving picture machinery, and particularly the "Pathescope." This machine, as the name implies, is made by Pathe Freres, of Paris. It is unique in design and a radical departure from any other moving picture machine on the market. Built in the machine is a dynamo and by turning the crank it will furnish its own light and project the picture. It uses special narrow-gauge non-inflammable film, each reel from three to four hundred feet long. The films are sold or rented. Regular film service is furnished for a very liberal price and "exchanges" will be established everywhere. Of course these exchanges will be placed with photographic dealers all over the country. A taking camera can also be had for them that desire to take their own "Pathescope" films.

On Wednesday evening a delightful banquet and entertainment was given by the members of the association in the Crystal Room of the Sherman House.

Thursday afternoon the dealers were invited by W. N. Selig to visit the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company. Special cars and automobiles brought the many delegates of the convention out to the plant, where they were entertained and taken all over the big studio. Of particular interest for them was to see the staging and taking of a moving picture play. Moving pictures were also taken of the delegates, which will later appear in the Hearst-Selig Weekly.

The convention closed Friday and was claimed to be a great success from every point of view. One thing is certain, it has no doubt greatly stimulated the photographic supply dealers' interest in the motion picture lines. New York City was selected as the meeting place for the next convention.

Following closely the National Photographic Dealers' convention comes the Kodak Exhibition at the First Regiment Armory, from March 30 to April 4. All of Eastman Kodak Company's products will be here on display and daily lectures will be given. Moving pictures will be a prominent part of the entertainment. This exhibit is for the general public.

ANOTHER PRODUCING COMPANY.

Announcement is made by the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation that it has opened offices in the Times Building, New York, with studios at City Island, N. Y., where work is progressing on the first release entitled "The Master Cracksman," a five-part feature with Harry D. Carey in the title role. Mr. Carey was formerly with the Biograph Company. The company has also in preparation a large series of comedy features entitled "The Bizzy Izzy Pictures," with George Sidney himself in the title roles.

Ohio Censorship Legal.

United States District Court Decides that the Constitution is not Violated—Law Valid Under Police and Licensing Power of the State.

On Thursday, April 2, Judges Warrington, Killetts and Day, of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division, handed down a decision denying the petitions of the Mutual Film Corporation of New York, and the Mutual Film Company of Cleveland, Ohio, asking for a permanent injunction to prevent the enforcement of the provisions of the Ohio State Censorship law.

The matter was argued before the court in November, 1913, by Attorneys Squire, Sanders and Dempsey of Cleveland, and W. N. Seligsburg, of New York, representing the petitioners.

In an opinion which accompanied the memorandum of decision denying the petitions for a permanent injunction, the court was unanimous upon all points, holding the Censorship law as constituted to be constitutional under the police powers of the state, and to be valid as a licensing law, also that it does not conflict with or violate the provisions of the Inter-State Commerce law of the United States as enacted by Congress.

On account of the importance of the questions involved the court has ordered that the temporary injunction be continued for fifteen days to give the petitioning companies an opportunity to perfect an appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

Jourjon Outlines Plans

Eclair President, His Return From Paris Hastened by the Recent Factory Fire, Talks Interestingly of Many Plans for His Company's Expansion.

By George Blaisdell.

CHARLES JOURJON, president of the Eclair Company, returned to New York on Saturday, March 28. His arrival at this time was due to his wish personally to supervise the rebuilding of the company's factory at Fort Lee, destroyed by fire on March 19. Mr. Jourjon received word in Paris on the morning following the blaze, and inside of twenty-four hours he was on his way to New York. In his office on Wednesday morning he talked most interestingly of the many plans he has in contemplation and under way for the extension of the American business of his company, plans by no means confined to the making of pictures, but which portend the reaching out of the Eclair Company for general business. For instance, the sale of professional cameras, home projectors and portable laboratories. Present also in President Jourjon's office was Claude Patin, the general secretary of the company, now permanently located in New York, and whose coming is indicative of the expanding business of Eclair.

Among the projects talked of by President Jourjon were the erection of a large studio in Tucson, Arizona, and the establishment in that Far Western country of four or five companies, where there is now but one; the installation in the new factory at Fort Lee, N. J., of an "automatic laboratory," a machine which takes the printed stock and develops it, tints and tones it and then dries it, leaving it ready for packing and shipping. Also, and this will be of particular interest to exhibitors, there will be installed for the first time in the United States machines for the automatic coloring of films. As is well known, there are but three companies using these machines, and these only in their Paris laboratories.

"Mr. Jourjon, what in your opinion constitutes the chief demand among foreign exhibitors—what classes of films are most preferred and in what lengths do they like them?" asked the writer.

"Why," responded the president of Eclair, "the chief demands in Europe, as I see the situation, are for the films the synopses of which have been written by well-known authors and also for well-known plays. Ordinarily the long films are not wanted—two thousand feet are enough. There is a good demand for thousand-foot lengths, chiefly in dramas. In Germany and, in fact, throughout Europe there is a call for long comedies, what might be described as vaudeville comedies. If you would have an illustration taken from the stage I would suggest, for instance, 'A Pair of Sixes,' now running in this city. The Paris Eclair Company started the fashion of putting out comedies by well-known French authors, like Feydeau, for example. The Palais Royal, one of the best-known theaters in Paris, put on our 'The Lady of Maxim's' and ran it for several weeks. We have a three-reel comedy here now all ready for the American market. We call it 'The Chocolate Girl.' We are anxious for American exhibitors to see it and give us their opinion of it. Summing up, I believe there is in Europe a big market for good dramas of one and two reels, nice comedies of two and three reels, good detective plays in about four reels, and big productions in six reels—the latter by well-known authors.

"You know the big success we had in America with detective films—such, for illustration, as 'Zigomar' and 'Protea.' We are ready to release in Europe in about another month a second 'Protea,' which will be six reels in length. It is full of punch. It will probably be released for the American market in July. In my opinion, the second installment is better than the first. 'Protea' was very well liked both in Europe and America. The third of the series is now under way."

MR. CHARLES JOURJON,
President of the Eclair Film Company.

Knowing that the Eclair Company is one of the leaders in the making of educational films the writer brought up the subject. "What do you hear about educational pictures?" Mr. Jourjon was asked.

"Why," responded the Eclair president—and his manner showed his interest in the whole question—"do you know as regards educational pictures there is a most singular situation. Both in America and in Europe there is no demand for them for regular programs—that is, from the exhibitors. Yet we receive from all over the country a mass of correspondence from schools and educational institutions generally asking us about this class of pictures. It is quite apparent that there is an active public demand for educationals, but the exhibitors do not reflect it. If these exchanges do not want these subjects there is no question in my mind as to the attitude of the public. I have often watched the faces in a house where an educational is being shown, and there is no better way to gauge the public taste.

"We have a collection of about 500 educational films—Scientia, you know, is our name for them,—and we are still accumulating more of them against the day when their popularity will not be questioned. I am sure they will be one of the big factors in the screen entertainment of the future—it is so difficult to get something new in the old style of kinematographic amusement. In Paris we have a specially equipped laboratory—and for that matter so also have Pathe and Gaumont—in connection with moving pictures. At the head of it are well-known professors of the National Museum of Natural History. We are spending much money in this department and getting meagre returns. Nevertheless, we realize that later on there will be a real demand for educational pictures, and we are going right on storing them up. It is time now to give to motion picture patrons something more useful than the regulation dramas and comedies."

"Mr. Jourjon, there seems to be a radical difference between America and Europe in the method of marketing films from the manufacturers' viewpoint. Which, personally, do you prefer, if that is a fair question?"

"I much prefer the American idea," was the ready reply. "In France we do not sell our films—we only rent them. This rule applies not only with Eclair, but also with other big manufacturers. I like the American way of selling outright far better than the European system. There is such big competition in Europe that this seems to be the only way, however. Yes, renting obtains in France, Italy, Austria and Spain. In England manufacturers both rent and sell. There is in France absolutely no prospect of a change in the present system. As regards some of the really big productions there is in vogue a plan of division of profits on a percentage basis between maker and exhibitor."

"Do you expect to remain long in this country on your present visit?" Mr. Jourjon was asked.

"Yes, I may be here six months," was the reply. "My chief concern at present, of course, is the building of our new factory. You know we also have a studio in Tucson, Arizona, and a company there of thirty people, and they have been doing good work. We intend to build in Tucson a big studio capable of accommodating the four or five companies we expect to install there. We are releasing today a three-reel product of our Arizona studio. 'The Caballero's Way,' the best Western we have made. One of the Broadway theaters is planning to run it for two or three weeks.

"Will the recent fire interfere with our plans? Well, of course, it was a terrible thing, but it may have good results. It will allow us to build in place of the old factory a new one on the best plans, one in every respect up to date. We are going to install an automatic laboratory, a machine that will develop, tint and tone and dry the stock, so that when it emerges it will be ready for packing and shipping. We have been using these machines in our Paris factory, but the one that goes into the Fort Lee building will be the first in America. There is now being constructed in our Paris factory another machine still more complete. It will take the exposed film at one end and do the printing, developing, tinting and toning, drying and cleaning. The machine will be about twenty-five feet in length. One man and one girl will operate two machines. These automatic innovations make for evenness of product, in the development, for instance; their operation is purely mechanical, and they eliminate in may ways the possibility of error by the human factor. So, too, are they very economical.

"We are also going to install a machine for the automatic coloring of films. Although there are three companies in Paris now using these machines, there is none in any other part of the world. Really there are two of these, one for the cutting and the other for coloring. While they are small, no larger than sewing machines and somewhat resembling them, they are not easy to describe. You know in colored work we have to use as many positives as there are colors to be reproduced. The difference between the automatic coloring of films and the hand process is the difference between the employment of one girl and twenty. Also there is obviated much of the eye strain that was caused by hand work.

"While the Eclair Company has heretofore given practically all of its attention to the production of pictures we are now going to sell cameras and home projectors. The camera is the Gillon, a small, single-box affair, weighing, above the tripod, but eighteen pounds, and with the tripod and loaded weighing inside of thirty-five pounds. It is a regulation professional instrument and has given the best results. Our cameramen the world over are equipped with them, and it will be but a very short time before we have them on the market for general sale—probably in about two months. Our Kineclair portable projector is designed for use in homes, clubs, schools, demonstrations in courts, in fact, everywhere. This will be ready for the market in a couple of weeks. We are also manufacturing for general sale a portable laboratory, all of which is inclosed in a box about two feet square. It contains every appliance for the development of film, even to the drying racks and dark room equipment, so that a director on the road can keep up with his work from day to day."

The branching out of the Eclair Company means that Mr. Jourjon will probably devote an increasing amount of attention to the American division of its business. This implies that this summer he will be with us here in New York instead of at his spacious country home in Epernay, France.

FRANK CRANE A "SOFT PEDAL" DIRECTOR.

Every director, according to his own ideas and training, has his own methods of directing. But it is a noticeable fact that a great majority of them are noisy in giving directions to players, particularly when in the midst of a big scene. Director Frank Crane, turning out Imp features, however, is an apostle of the "soft pedal" school.

"I was born in the West, raised on a farm and owned a ranch of my own," says Frank, "and my experience in handling farm animals has guided my handling of players. Yelling at a horse when he hesitates at jumping a stream or climbing a ridge always makes him nervous, unsure of himself and often balky. Experience has taught me that the same thing applies to an actor. Yell and rave at him when a difficult piece of work is to be done and he is apt to go to pieces and makes a mess of it. Just reassure your player with a soft word of encouragement and results are most satisfactory when the work is shown on the screen."

COME ON, BOYS; COL. RAMSEY'S COMING.

Col. L. H. Ramsey, of Lexington, Kentucky, Suh, representing fifty of the top-notch picture exhibitors of his State, will be in New York this coming week for the purpose of looking over the feature film market. Col. Ramsey will arrive Sunday, April 5, and will make his headquarters at the Imperial Hotel. He wants to meet all the feature men with a view to securing the best that the market affords for his associates. Remember, the Colonel has fifty or more big houses sewed up in his inside pocket.

"The Hindu Nemesis"

A Four-Reel Feature Production Released by the Master Producers' Film Company.

Reviewed by Harry W. DeLong.

THE theme and plot of this picture offering is out of the ordinary, and while it is clean and free of suggestion, there is some morbidity pertaining that when analyzed, on first impression, seems impossible for such complications to transpire in the ordinary channels of life. Delving deeper, and taking into consideration the many complexities and paradoxical events which daily occur, the anthesis of the narrative is distinctive. The four reels are full of thrilling and gripping scenes that are considerably melodramatic, but have been so well directed that they are not offensive. Mr. Harry E. Peel is the author, and he has developed a plot full of surprises. The leading character is a noble one, a retired banker, who is devoting his life to his wife and children, a boy and a girl.

Years prior, while active in the business world, he was instrumental in causing the imprisonment of Hassen Amru, an East Indian, for debt. Hassen Amru escapes prison, and determines to consummate plans he has evolved and nurtured during his incarceration, to avenge himself on the banker. During the absence of the parents, who were attending a social function, Hassen enlists the aid of an old clock tinker, who gains admission to the house, on pretense of repairing a grandfather's clock, and while the servants are inattentive he kidnaps the boy and delivers him to Amru.

Fifteen years elapse and Mr. Deleron, the banker, has never been able to discover or obtain tidings of his son, although large rewards have been offered. The girl has grown up and is a beautiful young lady, engaged to be married to Herbert Garwood, a young lawyer. Herbert purchases tickets to a theater where the attraction is an East Indian Company in a sensation, entitled, "The Mephisto Dance." After the performance, a member of the company protects Helen on the street, from a drunken rowdy. Herbert having been called away. She presents him with her card, and he shows it to Hassen Amru, who is the manager of the troupe. He is under an assumed name, and, seeing the possibilities of a diabolical revenge, he urges the young man, known as Olaf Berward, to call on Miss Deleron. There is a strong affinity between them, and Helen Deleron forgets her engagement to the young lawyer.

Not being aware of their relationship, and being urged on by Hassen, they flee in an auto, being followed by Hassen. The father is informed, and an exciting automobile chase occurs, ending in an accident, and later the pursuit of Hassen and Ruth, one of his troupe, who is in love with Olaf, over house-tops and down through a scuttle. On the stairs they quarrel and struggle, breaking the bannisters and both fall to their deaths. The acting is well done, but the photography is dense in some scenes. In others the light effects are up to the standard.

FRED HOWE DROPS IN.

Dr. Fred B. Howe, president of the Star Theater Company, of Ithaca, N. Y., was a caller at the New York office of the World this week. He was on a still hunt for big feature productions. Mr. Howe is branching out in the photographic end of the business, having a fine camera and an exclusive contract to film athletic events at Cornell University, which, as everybody knows, is located at Ithaca.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Turner & Dahnken's Picture House Circuit in California.

F. LAWRANCE, formerly manager of the Fresno Photo Theater, Fresno, Cal., paid us a visit last week. The Fresno is one of the chain of fourteen houses owned by Turner & Dahnken, who formerly ran the principal licensed exchange in San Francisco. Mr. Lawrance was in their employ for about five years; first in the capacity of traveling representative for the exchange, and afterward as manager of various houses on their circuit. Mr. Lawrance resigned his position recently, and intends settling in the East. He left for New York Saturday, March 28.

The Turner & Dahnken circuit represents a large outlay of capital. In addition to the Fresno, which seats 950 people, the firm own, in Fresno, the Star, with 700 seats; the Kinema, with 1,400 seats, and the Wigwam, with 500 seats. There are two other theaters in Fresno, one run by a Chinaman, and the other by a Japanese, both in the Chinese district.

Turner & Dahnken also own one house in Sacramento, one in Stockton, one in Richmond, two in Berkley, two in Oakland, two in San Francisco, and one in San Jose. The two San Francisco houses are the Tivoli Opera House, and the Globe, out in the Mission district. The Tivoli runs grand opera for two weeks in the year, and straight moving pictures the remaining fifty. The Tivoli has an organ and a ten-piece orchestra. It seats 2,200 people and the admission is ten and twenty cents for big feature programs. The Globe seats 2,000 people. The ruling prices on the circuit are ten cents in small houses and ten and twenty cents in large houses.

Licensed service is used on the entire circuit, and Mr. Lawrance reported excellent business. Over forty copies of the World are used on the circuit, Mr. Lawrance stated.

Mr. Lawrance also informed me that the Kilbrae Film Company has purchased twenty acres of ground on the outskirts of Fresno, and that a studio and plant are now being built. A. Braveman is president of the company, and Mr. Kelly is general manager.

The Superior Feature Film Company Formed.

Frank C. McCarahan, who resigned the position of manager for Geo. Kleine, March 14, has organized the Superior Feature Film Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois, to do business in renting feature films, also in buying and selling feature films, projecting machines and all accessories.

The incorporators are: F. C. McCarahan, president; John R. Hattsteadt, secretary and treasurer, and John J. Hattsteadt. Offices have been already opened at Suite 500 C, Powers Building, 37 South Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

Leading makes of the independent output, outside of the Universal and Mutual brands, will be handled. Mr. McCarahan and John R. Hattsteadt left for New York, Wednesday, April 1, and will look over the field thoroughly. The policy of the company will be to secure the best features, both of foreign and American make, for their customers. A special viewing of every subject will be a sine qua non before any purchase is made, so that the company's patrons can rely on subjects not only with good stories, technique and photography, but also with a special regard to their cleanness.

Mr. McCarahan established a reputation as a strenuous worker while with Mr. Kleine. He began as bookkeeper four years ago, holding that position for two years, when he was promoted to the position of manager.

Before joining the Kleine forces, Mr. McCarahan was in the employment of The Billboard for eight years, at the home office in Cincinnati, and he was manager of that office when appointed Chicago manager of the paper.

Mr. McCarahan is ambitious for the future of the Superior and is confident that the venture will prove the best with which he has been identified. He has an acquaintance with quite a following of exhibitors and is satisfied that he will be able to build up a flourishing and steadily growing business.

John G. Robinson Joins Selig Forces.

John G. Robinson, who is the eldest living member of the third generation of the famous Robinson family of circus fame, has joined Selig's Western force. He is the son of John F. Robinson, familiarly known as the "Governor" in circus circles, and grandson of John F. Robinson, known in his time by the sobriquet of "Uncle John."

The Robinson Circus, known as John Robinson's Ten Big Shows, was organized in 1824, being the first circus aggregation in the country and the first that ever owned its own train cars for transportation. The "Governor" handled the show from 1872 up until 1889, when his son, the subject of this sketch, took charge. He has had sole charge ever since.

In October last, Mr. Robinson rented Mr. Selig four elephants and a camel, which have been used in the Kathlyn pictures. He went out with these animals to the Selig zoo in Los Angeles and became so interested in animal pictures that he has decided to accept a position offered him by Mr. Selig, which will give him charge of all the animals in the Selig zoo. He will henceforth have charge of all animals used in the making of moving pictures.

Mr. Robinson has handled wild animals since a boy, when his father was running the circus. He used to go into the ring with the trainer who handled the elephants when only four years old, and took part in the act. One of his stunts at this early age was to lie down and let an old elephant, called "Mary," step over him. Lions, leopards, tigers, zebras and camels were his special favorites. He used to drive a team of 18 camels attached to the band wagon as a feature of the circus of the Robinson parades.

Mr. Robinson sees a big future in the position he will occupy, and believes that Selig's zoo can be made one of the big show places in California and the coast. His work, however, will be confined chiefly to the picture possibilities of the animals.

Mr. Robinson will leave for Los Angeles about the close of March.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The first set of "The Perils of Pauline" was successfully introduced in Chicago last week. A column criticism of the films by Alan Dale appeared in the Chicago Examiner, Thursday, March 26. "'The Perils of Pauline,' which is full of plot and incident and melodrama, 'gets over' capitally in moving pictures," he wrote.

H. O. Bodine, director of sales for the Raw Film Supply Company, Inc., New York City, and George L. Barrows, of the photographic department of the Berlin Aniline Works, New York City, were present at a private presentation of "The Spoilers," in the Selig demonstrating room, one day last week, during their attendance at the Independent Photographers' Convention in this city. An invitation to visit the Selig plant was extended all attending the convention and a splendid time was reported.

"The popular opinion of the Jew is that his sole interest is the acquiring of dollars by any means," said Rabbi Hirschberg last week, during a smoker at the Hotel Sherman by the Free Sons of Israel. "The fact is that in the field of philanthropy and charity the Jews are among the leaders." Rabbi Hirschberg urged his hearers to help prevent the caricaturing of Jews in moving pictures.

Young Prince Henry, of England, is at school in Eton. He was one of the 400 Eton boys who recently signed a petition to Headmaster Lyttleton against the banning of the local picture theater. Queen Mary, who disapproves of moving pictures, was the cause of the banning, which led to the closing of the theater, as it depended solely on the patronage of the boys. Prince Henry sent a copy of the petition to his mother.

"The Drug Terror," which had received the indorsement of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Sr., Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont and other prominent New York women, came near being refused a permit by Major Funkhouser. The major found that the permit granted did not include any clause relative to the barring of children from presentations of the films. Frederick H. Robinson, president of the sociological fund of the Medical Review of Reviews, with which Mrs. Vanderbilt and her associates are affiliated and under the auspices of which "The Drug Terror" is to be shown in Chicago, wired Charles R. Macloon, the Chicago representative, last week, to assure Major Funkhouser that it had never been the intention of the projectors to permit persons under eighteen years of age to see the picture. As yet it has not been definitely decided as to what method shall be employed to show "The Drug Terror" to the best advantage from an educational standpoint.

A private exhibition of the moving pictures taken by Professor Frederick Starr in Japan and Korea, in 1913, was given in the Selig demonstrating room, at 20 East Randolph Street, Thursday afternoon, March 26. Invitations were sent out by Professor Starr. The list of Japanese pictures included scenes at Asakusa, the letter writer, a ferry boat, cormorants, the fan-dancer, geisha dances, the juggler, a theater at Benkei and Goshitsune, rapid transformation, popular theater, top spinner, trick-magic, wrestlers, school-boys' drill and Asakusa cleaning. The Korean views revealed: scenes at the gate, the stone pile, laundrying, agriculture, the great market at Kinsen, the celebration of Imperial Birthday at Seoul, Korean music, dances—love, sword, bird and grace—and the performance of the Mudang, or possessed sorceress.

F. J. Flaherty, manager of the Standard Branch of the Universal, this city, made a pleasant call at the office one day last week. Mr. Flaherty stated that his office is at present working hard on the new Universal series, "Lucille Love," the girl of mystery, which will be released the week of April 13th. He stated that bookings are being made rapidly for this feature. It is understood, although the name of the paper is not at present known, that this 15-reel series will be given an advertising campaign for 15 weeks in one of the Chicago papers.

A "MENDEL BEILIS" PICTURE.

French-American Film Company Offers a Picture Version of the Incident Written by a Russian Secret Police Officer.

The affair of Mendel Beilis, whose trial at Kiev, Russia, was given so much space by some American newspapers a few months ago, is offered in picture form by the French-American Film Company, Times Building, New York. The subject is in five parts under the title, "The Mystery of the Mendel Beilis Case," and was made in Germany from a story of the incident related by Rosskovski, the Russian detective who was detailed to investigate the case for the government.

Upon taking charge of the case Rosskovski soon formed the theory that Beilis was not guilty of the crime as charged, but that a gang of thieves, fearing detection, were the guilty ones. Upon this theory the picture was built, the various scenes illustrating the progress of the investigation, parts of which are duly authenticated by the testimony adduced at the trial.

Rosskovski resigned his position after completing his work on this case and is now in New York, supposed to be seeking a mysterious woman who is the missing link in the evidence.

INDEPENDENT FEATURES COMPANY STAFF.

President N. F. Evans, of the Independent Features Company, which is doing business in three Ohio cities, writes to the Moving Picture World from Cleveland announcing the engagement of W. W. Culp, a well known film man, as general road representative; C. F. Rogers, formerly assistant manager of the Mutual Film Corporation at Cincinnati as a member of the road staff, and Howard Hohlan, formerly assistant manager for the General Film Company at Cleveland, as booking manager of the Cleveland office.

The offices of the Independent Features Company will be managed as follows: Cincinnati, I. W. McMahon and Jerome M. Jackson; Toledo, W. J. Findlay; Cleveland, N. F. Evans.

PICTURES AT VACATION HEADQUARTERS.

An interesting program of educational motion pictures was given at Vacation Headquarters, Tuesday night, at 38 West 39th Street, New York. The entertainment followed the formal opening of headquarters earlier in the evening. The program consisted of "The Glories of Rome," and the following parts of this fine series were shown: The Colosseum in Films, The Residences of the Popes and Fountains of Rome. The pictures were explained by W. Stephen Bush. The mistress of ceremonies for the evening was Miss Elisabeth Marbury. The Vacation Headquarters are financed by the Vacation Savings Fund, of which Miss Robinson Smith is chairman, Mrs. August Belmont, vice-chairman, and Miss Anne Morgan, treasurer.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THESE are the days of great pictures. One of the greatest of these is "The Christian," the Vitagraph-Liebler eight-reel production, which last week was shown at the Manhattan Opera House. It emphasizes the value of the story—and in this subject one is never out from under its spell. A great advantage in "The Christian" is that no preliminary knowledge of the book or the play is necessary to the full enjoyment of the picture. The action runs as smoothly, as clearly, as coherently, as any one could desire. And such a cast! Earle Williams had an opportunity almost equal to that of Henri Krauss in "Les Miserables." His John Storm was a splendid, a scholarly, portrayal. Miss Storey's Glory Quayle was the best this versatile young woman has given us. Harry Northrup was the perfect villain—his Lord Ure was played to the last inch and not a hair's breath over the line of natural acting. The veteran Charles Kent brought to the characterization of Father Lamplugh the rich experience of many years. It was thus right down the line. It is to be regretted that the stage accessories and the music of the Manhattan production could not follow the film.

It is said that of "Les Miserables" 400 copies were sold throughout the world. Outside of the United States, where the production was cut to nine reels, the length was twelve reels. Which means that approximately 4,800,000 feet of "Les Miserables" was circulated. Of Pathe's Passion Play 1,200 copies were sold. The negative was so badly worn that a reproduction was necessary. These are undoubtedly world's records.

Without attempting a comparison of Caine's work with Hugo's as a piece of world literature, it will be interesting to learn the final sales of "The Christian" in its screen form. In any event, the Vitagraph Company and Director Frederick Thomson have laid picture followers under deep obligation.

Darwin Karr leaves Brooklyn on Saturday for Texas, where he will play leads in a half-dozen military dramas to be produced by the Vitagraph company for exhibition at the Vitagraph Theater. The stories, it is said, will run from two to four reels in length. Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady is the author, and the serial title is announced as "The Regular Army Man." The Secretary of War has promised the co-operation of the troops at Galveston, under General Funston, and those at San Antonio, under General Bliss. The pictures will be made under the direction of Captain Harry Lambart, of the Vitagraph staff, formerly an officer in the British army. As there are 130 scenes to be photographed it is probable that the company will be away two or three months.

Just had a look at Keystone's "A Rural Demon," released March 19. It is just as funny as it is safe for any film to be. Began to get worried at one stage—pain in the side and all that sort of stuff that ungently reminds one he has laughed enough. Ruscoe Arbuckle was the chief offender, and aiding and abetting him was as tough and unbruisable a bunch of rubber-jointed fun-making pirates as ever faced a camera. Such films as "A Rural Demon" would compel the most pronounced anti-slapsticker to recant and maybe even apologize.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

STATE LEAGUE CONVENTION.

Many Meetings Scheduled for the Various State Organizations Affiliated With the National League.

THE season for State conventions of the exhibitors' league is at hand and there are signs of unusual activity among exhibitors throughout the country. In several States organizers from the National League are busy canvassing for membership and urging exhibitors to attend the State conventions. The result promises to be satisfactory, both in point of attendance and the acquisition on new members.

Florida will lead off this month with a meeting at Sanford on April 6 and 7. It is reported that a thorough canvass of the State has been made and that the meeting will be a large and interesting one.

Wisconsin follows with a meeting at Green Bay on April 7 and 8. This State never had a real organization until President Neff undertook to get the exhibitors together last fall. There was a big meeting at Oshkosh and the Wisconsin branch of the National League became a regular member of the big organization with something like eighty members. Since that event much good work has been done by the officers of the State organization and a large meeting is promised. Henry Goldman, of Green Bay, is chairman of the convention committee and has prepared an interesting program of entertainment ending in a banquet at the close of the convention.

Down in Kentucky preparations have been under way for some weeks for the big meeting the exhibitors of that State propose to hold May 21 and 22 at the Phoenix Hotel, Lexington. J. H. Stamper, chairman of the convention committee has made a canvas of the State and reports that fully ninety per cent. of the exhibitors of the State will be present at the convention. The State League has been successful in defeating some very dangerous legislation and the fight has aroused the trade to the necessity of being prepared to meet any similar attack that might be made in the future. President Dittmar has had a very successful administration and it is largely through his wisdom in directing the affairs of the league that the Kentucky organization is in such good shape. Indications are that the Lexington meeting will be some affair.

Illinois exhibitors will make a great showing at the State convention to be held in Springfield on April 28 and 29. G. M. Westley, national organizer, has been working in that State for several weeks and reports that a large number have been taken into the fold as a result of his labors and that the convention will be the largest ever held in that State. W. W. Watts, chairman of the committee of arrangements, has prepared an interesting program and is enthusiastic over the prospects of a big meeting. President Neff and other National League officers will be present at this meeting.

Other conventions scheduled are: New York State at Hotel Rochester, Rochester, N. Y., May 5; Iowa State at Des Moines, Iowa, May 12 and 13; North and South Carolina States in conjunction at Charlotte, N. C., May 18, 19 and 20; Alabama State at Birmingham, Ala., May 21 and 22; Michigan State at Detroit, Mich., June 9, 10 and 11.

Dates have not yet been set for league conventions to be held in the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Indiana, Texas, Louisiana, Georgia and Arkansas, but the State officers are actively working toward that end and dates will be announced soon.

SECRETARY WILEY IN DAYTON.

On April 1, Secretary George H. Wiley, managing director of the Dayton exposition to be held under the auspices and in conjunction with the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, returned to his desk at the convention headquarters, Commercial Building, Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Wiley will remain in Dayton until the conclusion of the convention July 11, to attend to league matters.

THE OPEN SUNDAY.

Address by Walter Murphy, an Exhibitor at Two Harbors, Mich., on the Question Before a Church Congregation.

INVITED by the pastor of a local church at Two Harbors, Minn., to discuss the right and wrong of the Sunday opening question, Walter Murphy, an enterprising exhibitor and manager of the star Theater of that town, responded in a most able manner. The text of Mr. Murphy's address has been received by The Moving Picture World and, because of the excellent arguments he has advanced, it is printed here in full.

Is it wrong to run moving pictures on Sundays?

I will ask you to grant that the best of the present-day moving pictures are not harmful, and that it is not harmful to run them on week days.

Moving pictures are one of the 10 greatest inventions of modern times. Yesterday, it is estimated, that 8,000,000 people saw moving pictures and that there are 20,000 moving picture theaters in the United States.

Owing to the fact that the average present-day moving picture does no harm and, on the other hand, owing to the fact that it is easily proved that moving pictures of the present-day type do a great good, a good that it is impossible to estimate, besides furnishing the highest type of amusement known to the present-day civilized world,—owing to these facts, the question resolves itself thusly:

Should we stop doing something on Sundays, that is at the present doing a great good on all week days?

Do you want the 20,000 theaters to close their doors every Sunday to 8,000,000 people and take away the good that is done by showing the high class present-day moving picture, which not only amuses, but which instructs in many ways, opens up to the poorer class, the world's beauty spots, nature's great parks, reviews all current events, gives the modern and best ways of doing those things in which we cannot afford to take individual instruction, and in many cases actual reproductions of Bible stories,—I repeat it, do you want to take away this privilege from 8,000,000 every Sunday?

You may answer, "Yes," close the moving picture theater on Sundays and let these people go on week days, but right here is an all important question. Can these 8,000,000 people all go to moving picture shows on week days? Are there not thousands of working people today who work 8 to 10 hours at hard labor, and who walk 8 to 10 blocks to and from their work? Do not the greater share of these men have chores to do at home evenings, wood to saw, cows to milk, additions to build onto their homes and many other important duties which occupy their whole evening, or until it is too late to prepare for and go to a moving picture theater, and return home in time to get their required rest before going to work the next morning at an early hour? I will venture to say that at the very least, 2,000,000 out of the 8,000,000 who frequent theaters on Sundays, cannot and do not go on week days.

I understand that you will say and believe that it is a sin to do anything on Sunday that is done for business or for pleasure or for both. That this is in violation of the Sabbath as Christ would have us keep it.

If you do believe this, then all trains should be stopped, telephones not used, telegraph stations closed, drug stores all closed up tight,—and I will show you just why a little later,—no newspapers should be printed on Sunday, no livery stables should be open, no amusement parks open, no fishing, hunting, and all libraries should be closed to all books, papers, etc., except the Bible and actual religious matter. Nothing should be done on Sunday that would in any way interfere with the keeping of the Sabbath day holy.

If you believe in keeping the Sabbath day holy, then all of the things mentioned should be stopped, and stopped at once all over the United States. All of the things mentioned and many more keep employees and many others away from Church who would otherwise go.

But before you stop the moving picture on Sundays, you will have to stop all of the modern inventions and conveniences that I have named and many, many more. For besides being run for business and pleasure, the moving picture does a tremendous good that none of these other inventions do. I am ready to prove to you that more good can be imparted by one 15-minute moving picture than can be obtained in any other way in four hours. It is a fact that some moving pictures which give the highest type of instruction require months of patient work and study. For instance, the picture showing the complete life history of the silk-worm, which is given in fifteen minutes and which took months to make.

Again I say, before you stop the moving picture on Sundays, stop all and every other modern invention from being used on Sundays, which we can get along without, and which we did get along without for centuries, and which does less good than the moving picture.

Taking up two of these in detail, the libraries and the drug stores.

The average high class censored moving picture is of a high class, and more instructive, as well as more entertaining than the average magazine article. Therefore, if you throw out the moving pictures on Sunday, throw out or stop reading all modern magazines and only read and use those which pertain strictly to the Bible.

If you stop moving pictures on Sundays, close all libraries, for it forces the librarian to work, and it is not necessary, as you can exchange your books during the week.

Drug Stores are open on Sundays for business and convenience,—mostly business. This is not necessary, for if it is necessary to get a prescription filled on Sunday, you can walk to the druggist's home and get him to go to the drug store and fill your particular prescription, without opening his store all day.

Why, it is decidedly wrong to study on Sundays, for studying is actual work in most cases, and is not considered an enjoyment. Even it is considered an enjoyment to study your lessons on Sunday, it is wrong, if it is wrong to run moving pictures, for moving pictures are equally as entertaining as your school lessons, and often more so.

Now, from another viewpoint, suppose you forget all the other modern inventions and conveniences which you tolerate on Sunday, and say that from your religious teachings that it is decidedly wrong to run moving pictures on Sundays. Suppose you say it and believe it without proving it. Then would you expect us to close our theater in this city? That is, would you think anything would be gained by our closing on Sundays before it becomes a Universal Movement? Would you expect us to close and let some other company come into town and by running on Sundays, take in enough more money to shortly drive us into bankruptcy? And, in the bargain, have a picture show that did not come up to the one you now have? This would happen just as sure as day follows night.

It is your perfect right to believe that nothing should be done on Sundays but go to church and remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, and it might be the best thing in the world if this belief was universally accepted and carried out. But we are not living in the days of the Puritans, when there was nothing to do, but go to church and stay at home. More inventions and discoveries have been brought to light and given us to use in the last decade than it is possible for us to realize, making this the greatest day ever known to man, and giving us the privilege of living at a time superior to any that has gone before.

Jesus said to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Science proves that every man, living creature and piece of machinery is better off, for resting one day in seven, but does the Bible say that all men should rest on the same day at the same time. Is this not a personal equation to a great extent? Should we not meet present day conditions the best we can, under the circumstances, go to church when we can, and at all times carry the spirit and teachings of Jesus Christ with us in our every day life.

To sum up. Before you decide that the moving picture theater ought to be closed on Sundays, consider every other modern invention and convenience that is used on Sunday for business and pleasure, and which does less good for mankind than the moving picture. You would have to stop all the wheels of this present-day advanced civilization, and stop them all, before you do the moving picture.

NEW YORK MEETING ANNOUNCED.

To the Exhibitors of the United States:

You are hereby invited to attend the annual convention of the International Motion Picture Association at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, June 8th to the 13th.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors, it was decided that this shall be solely and purely a business convention without the injection of any politics whatsoever. If you will send me your name, address and the name of your theater, you will receive an identification card. Upon presentation of this identification card in New York you will receive a badge entitling you to admission to the convention and a voice and vote in all matters that may come before it. You will also receive guest badges and tickets for your family and friends entitling them to admission to the exposition to be held in conjunction with the convention and to partake in all the entertainments, outings, banquets, balls, etc., that are now being arranged for all visiting exhibitors and their families.

MASSACHUSETTS CENSOR BILL WITHDRAWN.

The proposed bill offered in the Massachusetts State Legislature to establish a State censorship over all pictures for use in that State, is out of the way for this year. The matter was brought up on the afternoon of Friday, March 27, and leave to withdraw was given by the Committee on Mercantile Affairs, into whose hands it had been committed. Considerable pressure had been brought to bear upon the committee by the various motion picture interests. President Ernest Horstmann, of the Massachusetts exhibitors, and Harry F. Campbell, chairman of the Legislative Committee, worked with untiring zeal against the bill and deserve the thanks of the trade for their efforts. The World correspondent intimates that he will soon have some good news regarding the 20-minute bill.

"MISS BEAUTIFUL" ACCEPTS A DARE.

The Thanhouser press department received some panning for their recent stories on "Miss Beautiful," a member of the stock company whom they claim is a bona fide society girl and whose real name can't, therefore, be divulged. A Chicago editor wrote: "Think of pulling the story of 'Miss Beautiful,' the lady who won't let the trade papers publish her photographs because she is afraid some one will recognize her as a prominent society girl, and then of announcing that she is to be featured in Thanhouser pictures." The item was shown to the "society girl" by Mr. Hite. "I'll dare 'em," she said—"go ahead and print my photo in the trade papers and see if I am recognized." So the leading trade papers have been supplied with likenesses, and the worst is yet to come. The general conjecture is that "Miss Beautiful" is really a society girl as alleged. It is not believed that a professional actress would ask anyone to keep her name out of print!

Miss "Beautiful."

Here is a chance for the "identifiers" to get busy. The engraving printed herewith is a particularly good likeness of the young lady we are told. If she can get by the lynx-eyed enthusiasts who frequent the photoplay theaters she will have accomplished something that few good-looking young women of the screen have yet succeeded in doing, at least for any considerable length of time. There is just a possibility, to be sure, that the young incognito is not so great a society lady as she pretends; there is just a possibility that she is trying to make us believe that she belongs to the "charmed circle" when she is only hanging on the precarious edge. She will have to prove her title to the position claimed, eventually, we fear, but, in the meantime we will take her at her own estimate and urge the professional guessers to get busy.

"THE LIFE OF BIG TIM SULLIVAN" (Gotham).

The first public showing of the big four-part photoplay showing the life of "Big Tim" Sullivan, from his birth to his death, will be that at Marcus Loew's Broadway Theater, Wednesday, April 1st, for one day only. It will afterwards be shown at the Delancey Street Theater, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Avenue B Theater the following Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. Much of Big Tim's life was spent in the vicinity of the latter two theaters, and many of the photoplay scenes were taken there.

Joe Sullivan, almost identical with "Big Tim" in size and general appearance, plays the lead in the photodrama, which has a plot, in addition to depicting faithfully the early struggles of the East Side benefactor. Hundreds of Bowery characters were hired in getting true-to-life scenes, some of them who had benefited at the hands of the big politician during his life, and hundreds are expected to see themselves and the story of his life in the pictures.

The film story begins with the landing of Tim's parents in America, his birth and christening, and his orphan school days. His generosity, his struggles, and his growth to man's estate are all portrayed with painstaking realism. The story is carried to the later years of his life, when Joe Sullivan takes up the interpretation of the famous double.

LOUISE GLAUM STARTS THE BABOON KISS.

We have had the baboon rags, baboon songs and the baboon dance, but it has remained for Louise Glam to establish the baboon kiss. Take a glance at the accompanying photograph and decide whether or not you would like to follow suit. Perhaps not. But there—you do not know this particular baboon. Louise Glaum does and so do dozens of others, his neighbors down in the sunny San Fernando Valley, California. And they do say. Miss Glaum among them, that he is an intelligent high-brow, particularly gifted in the art of kissing.

Louise Glaum and Monk.

"Charley," as he is called by his friends, is the property of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and the special pet of Isidore Bernstein, manager of the company's Pacific Coast studios. Next to Mr. Bernstein, the baboon likes the girls best and he experiences little trouble in securing their society. They think him a dear—he is so knowing and affectionate.

Miss Glaum has just finished appearing in a comedy opposite "Universal Ike" (Augustus Carney), entitled, "Universal Ike Makes a Monkey of Himself." In it Miss Glaum plays the party of a stranded actress. The present photograph was snapped during one of the scenes.

CRANE PRODUCES HIS FIRST THREE-REELER FOR IMP.

Frank Crane, director of Imp features, has begun the production of a three-reel drama, entitled "On the Chess Board of Fate," written by W. Hanson Durham. It is the first three-reeler to be attempted by Mr. Crane since his affiliation with the Universal's Imp company, and he considers it one of the best dramas that has come under his hand in a long time. The author, Mr. Durham, was formerly editor of the Vitagraph's Western company and a director under Rollin S. Sturgeon. The story centers around an old doctor who tries to use his daughter as a pawn to save himself from prison. Walter Miller, formerly star of the Biograph company, will enact the lead. Alexander Gaden will play the heavy.

AUTOMATIC TICKET SELLERS POPULAR.

The sales of the Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company are being handled for Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio from its Pittsburgh branch, conducted by H. C. Simeral, 5923 Alder Street, Pittsburgh. In addition to business from moving picture theaters already completed, this company is receiving numerous orders from theaters now in course of completion, and its factory is taxed to its capacity to take care of this business.

"FIGHTING DEATH" (Solax).

Instead of depending upon one sensational act of spectacular daring for its thrills, "Fighting Death" contains three of Rodman Law's most famous feats of daredeviltry. A strong consistent story makes the drama intensely interesting and leads up to the big moments with splendid effect, while the climaxes in which Rodman Law and Constance Bennett perform their hair-raising plunges from dizzy heights are truly remarkable.

A trusting young mountaineer is led into a trap by his rival for a pretty school teacher's hand. The rival offers him $500 to manage an illicit "still" and then betrays him to the authorities. He escapes to New York after marrying the girl, but his letters are intercepted by his rival, who tries to win the affections of his wife, and he risks a return to the village to see her at all costs as he cannot understand her silence. Seeing her in the arms of his rival, he returns to New York broken-hearted, only to be followed by his wife, who has remained faithful to him and borne him a child. Reunited in the city, the couple return for the child and are attacked by a posse, which has been summoned by the rival. A desperate fight ends in a surprise climax in which the truth comes strangely to light.

Daredevil Rodman Law crosses a 250-foot cable, hand over hand, above Ausable Chasm; a horse and two riders plunge fifty-eight feet into a raging torrent; the first woman bridge-jumper in the world makes the death-defying leap into the icy waters of the East River, New York City; and Rodman Law throws himself from the great Williamsburgh Bridge during these four remarkable reels.

Northrup, James Morrison, Donald Hall, J. W. Sambrook, Edward Kimball, Carlotta de Felice and Jane Fearnley. NED KORNBLITE HEADS MERGER COMPANY.

The Star and the Symphony theaters, both of Binghamton, N. Y., have been merged with the result that the new company is a $100,000 concern. The officers of the new corporation are Ned Kornblite, president; J. Kornblite, vice-president, and David Cohen, secretary and treasurer. These officers with F. L. Cohen constitute the board of directors. The combined seating capacity of these houses aggregates 2,000 Excellent programs have been outlined by the company, and many of the pictures to be shown are to be six and eight-reel productions. The subjects shown at either one of the companies' houses will not be exhibited at the other.

On October 20, 1913, the Star Theater was reopened after it had been remodeled and enlarged at a great expense. The seating capacity of this house is 1,000, and an excellent view of the picture is afforded from every seat. Like the Star, the Symphony also has a seating capacity of 1,000. It was opened one month later than the Star, and a feature of that house is its symphony organ. The mergers will continue to supervise the management of their respective houses.

"THE INDEPENDENCE OF SUSAN" (American).

A one-reel drama giving a comprehensive version of the experiences and tribulations of the homesteader.

Susan Miller and Joe Williams have taken up adjoining claims. Williams, knowing the requirements of the law, is busy putting the required portion of his claim under cultivation, but is not unmindful of the fact that his fair neighbor is not meeting requirements, so proffers his aid, which is refused by the independent Susan.

Susan has a high regard for Joe but is taken in by the smooth talk of the landgrabber, to whom she confides that she has not succeeded in putting the necessary portion of her land under cultivation. The culprit attempts to profit by this information by laying claim to the land. Joe took pains, however, to aid his neighbor without her knowledge, by working nights and so making up her delinquency. A fierce encounter puts the landgrabber to rout and the two neighbors unite their claims.

A well-acted drama produced under the direction of Tom Ricketts for the American Film Manufacturing Company, with all details faithfully carried out. Excellent photographic quality prevails. A very commendable subject. Release date—Wednesday, April 15, 1914.

"STERLING" ADOPTED AS UNIVERSAL BRAND.

After perusing over three thousand letters containing suggestions for a name of the new brand of Universal films in which Ford Sterling will appear, Fred J. Balshofer, president of the Sterling Motion Picture Company, has named Mrs. Frieda Decker, 8416 Seventeenth Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., as winner of the $25 reward for the best suggestion.

"Sterling" is the brand-name submitted by Mrs. Decker and which has been chosen by Mr. Balshofer as the trade mark for all comedies in which Mr. Sterling, formerly of Keystone fame, will appear.

In choosing a name for these great comedies, Mr. Balshofer said:

"Among more than two thousand letters containing suggestions along this line, fully ninety per cent. mentioned the name "Sterling," in one combination or another, as the most significant and most appropriate general brand-name for these comedies."

ECLECTIC BRANCH EXCHANGE OPENED IN CINCINNATI.

The Eclectic Film Company announces that it has opened another branch of the Eclectic Feature Film Exchange, which is located at 217 East 5th Street, Cincinnati, Ohio. This branch will be under the management of S. P. Hetteyberg, who is an experienced exchange man and thoroughly familiar with the wants of the exhibitors throughout his territory.

"LORD ALGY" (Lubin).

THIS excellent comedy is not intended as a satire on the English toff, but really a very truthful picture of the man with mannerisms that cause a smile in America and induce us to make little of a type of manhood that is extremely worthy. Lord Algy's trip to America was really to perfect himself in golf; he had proved that the Americans excelled in the game and he wanted to go back and lick all of his brother Britishers. But reverse came and he found more serious work than playing the aristocratic game and when necessary he found himself able to drive a truck horse and do a real man's work. His fellow workmen soon forgot his mannerisms and monocle and agreed that he was a good fellow and when the opportunity came to test his nerve he was not wanting. Again he came into his own and, winning a fair lady, he was voted every inch a man.

Mr. McCloskey has made an excellent scenario of a very excellent tale and given Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe the best comedy roles they ever attempted.

"TITO, THE TERROR" (Three-Part Warner's Feature).

This striking production combines unusual scenic effects with a subtle plot—intricate, yet easy to follow. The remarkable adventures of the detective who risks his life to run to earth the clever thieves who have robbed Mlle. Tarsova of her jewels are scenes that will not soon be forgotten. The climax in the third part where the detective jumps from his aeroplane, and captures Tito, the king of the bandits, is a startling one, no less surprising than realistic.

Scene from "Tito, the Terror" (Warner's Features).

The situations in this feature production are exciting enough to compel the closest attention from start to finish. There are numerous scenes of unique character introduced throughout the production that are absolutely new to motion pictures. The acting of the principals, who are stars of the Paris stage, is most convincing, and contributes largely to the success of the play.

"AT THE HOUR OF DAWN" (Gaumont).

The Gaumont Company will release on April 4 a three-part subject, "At the Hour of Dawn." The company announces that it is a great spectacular masterpiece, fairly comparable to its recent successful "The Fall of Constantinople." The story opens in Nocera, a small town of Central Italy, on the Saturday before Palm Sunday of 1396. The leading citizens are gathered in state to consider the demands of a powerful band of mercenaries, which were that the keys of the town be surrendered to Biordo de Michelotti and that he be acknowledged their lord. The citizens being in no condition to resist, they were compelled to surrender. This action so humiliated Lorenzo Ferrari, a young hotblood, that he decided to leave town. Before doing so he called on his sweetheart, Gemma. With the blessing of her grandfather the two young people plighted their troth. The conquerors seized the women and girls and carried them off.

Scene from "At the Hour of Dawn" (Gaumont).

When Biordo discovered that Lorenzo was not in the town he decreed the execution the following morning of Gemma unless Lorenzo should appear to take her place. Lorenzo, who had left the town, was only by chance advised of this some time later. He hastily gathered together some of the powerful men of his acquaintance and rapidly descended upon the soldiers of Biordo, who taken by surprise while busily engaged at the ceremony of the execution, were completely overpowered, and Gemma saved only in the nick of time. Thus the townspeople, freed once again, lived to praise the name of Lorenzo Ferrari.

AN ALL-STAR RETROSPECT.

Beginning with Augustus Thomas' play, "Arizona," in which Cyril Scott was featured as Denton, it being the first appearance of that capable actor in motion pictures, the All-Star Company has gone most carefully over the fiield and selected a variety of productions and stars and offered such stars in their first motion picture appearance in nearly every instance. They have produced Eugene Walter's greatest play, "Paid in Full," with Tully Marshall as Joe Brooks; Richard Harding Davis' play, "Soldiers of Fortune," in which Dustin Farnum made his first appearance before the camera; a five-part picture of Henry Blossom's play, "Checkers," in which Thomas W. Ross appeared; and their latest release, "In Mizzoura," in which Burr McIntosh comes back to the limelight after an absence of several years to also make his first appearance in moving pictures in the role which he created several years ago, that of Jo Vernon, the village blacksmith.

"TRAPPED IN THE GREAT METROPOLIS" (Rolands).

The Rolands Feature Film Company has just released a five-reel photodrama entitled "Trapped in the Great Metropolis." This picture has been written and produced under the sole direction of George K. Rolands, late of the Universal Film Company.

It contains 500 scenes and over 400 characters were needed for the ensemble work in the scenes depicting police life in New York City. The Broadway scenes in this picture were taken at great expense and risk, and the auto chases on the Great White Way were witnessed by thousands of curious spectators.

"THE WINNER" (Essanay).

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company will release a splendid two-reel comedy, entitled "The Winner," on Friday, April 17th.

The story is a unique one concerning the election of "A Chicken Coop Inspector." Dan Ryan and Fritz Noodle, two would-be politicians, are candidates for the position and incidentally for the hand of the Widow Guggenheimer. Lovers of comedy photoplays will be well pleased with the character—Dan Ryan, handled so admirably by Eddie Redway, a newcomer in motion pictures. Wallace Beery, always funny, plays the role of Fritz Noodle. His characterization of this part is indeed comical and the business he has injected into the picture will make screams. Louise Willis, another newcomer, plays the part of the widow with an original touch. The photography is excellent.

CHARIOT FILM CO. ENTERS THE ARENA.

The Chariot Film Corporation, a recently organized concern, announces its first release, "The God of Vengeance," for April 2. The picture deals with a fantastical sect of East Indian idol worshippers. It is in four reels. A release will be made every three weeks. Alex Yokel, a former theatrical man and partner of Geo. W. Lederer, well known in New York and Chicago, is president and general manager of the new company. The executive offices are at 110 West Fortieth Street, New York City.

WESTERN ECLAIR COMPANY.

The accompanying engraving is from a group photograph of the Western Eclair Company of players now located at Tuscon, Ariz., under the direction of Webster Cullison. In the group are the following named players: J. W. Johnston, Fred G. Hearn, H. Stanley, Richard Bartlett, Norbert A. Myles, Hal Wilson, Henry Alrich, Webster Cullison, Edna Payne, Cath. Greely, Cecil Breton, Ann-Eve Mansfeld, Lucie K. Villa, R. Guissart, Pearl Cook, Bird. Challenger, Leonora Mansfeld.

The company has also acquired a ten-room house, completely furnished, and have erected a plant 132 by 700 feet, which consists of a corral, studio, property house, dressing rooms, scenery rooms, stables, trunk room, wardrobe room, saddle and harness room, well-equipped business office and a large wagon yard.

The stables contain at the present time fourteen western ponies and, roosting comfortably in a menagerie, is one American eagle which measures seven feet from tip to tip, three squirrels, one horned toad and that rare and valuable animal, a silver fox. One Eclair western photoplay which has attracted considerable attention is "The Caballero's Way" from the story by O. Henry. This is in three reels, and from beginning to end is a film with action.

"HER FALSE FRIEND" (Kleine-Cines).

A fire at sea, in which a mighty ship burns in mid-ocean and only the timely arrival of a rescuer in a motor craft saves the heroine from death, furnishes the nucleus of an exciting story dramatically told in George Kleine's forthcoming two-reel subject, "Her False Friend." This feature was produced by the "Cines" Company of Rome in the picturesque environs of Seville, Spain. Beautiful settings, magnificent lighting effects and technical excellence are particularly patent in "Her False Friend," and the acting and direction are fully up to the standard maintained in Kleine productions.

Scene from "Her False Friend" (Kleine-Cines).

The story centers about the malevolent activities of a woman who seeks revenge upon her successful rival in love, convincing her former lover of his wife's infidelity and leading him eventually into a series of misfortunes which culminate in his death. It is powerfully told, all of the characters being splendidly portrayed by some of Europe's most gifted players. "Her False Friend" is scheduled for release through the General Film Company, April 21.

The Western Eclair Company, Located at Tucson, Arizona.

"WHEN THE GIRLS JOINED THE FORCE" (Nestor).

"Extra! Extra! Extra! Big graft in Police Department. Chief is dismissed. The whole force is accused. Women gain glorious victory. Mrs. Van Allen is appointed to succeed old chief. Lady cops will guard our fair city. Forty of our fairest daughters were sworn in at the City Hall to-day."

Thus read the scare lines on the latest extra.

Of course this play is a comedy—and it has been written and produced by Al E. Christie, responsible for such laugh-provokers as "She Was Only a Working Girl" and "The Cheese Special." Mr. Christie has enlarged on the prospect of our mothers and sisters coming into politics and produced a burlesque on whirlwind lines, never before equaled for lavishness and richness of incident. Miss Stella, the only woman chief of police in the world—chief of Universal City—plays one of the important roles and supporting her is the entire police force of the city. It was during the production of this comedy that permission was secured from the mayor of Los Angeles to march the Universal City police force through the city's streets, headed by a band and followed by a line of political women.

This incident, humorous for the dismay and disturbance it caused among the business sections of Los Angeles, is cleverly incorporated in the picture. Then we have scenes in the police station after the women come into power. What the women do not do to make the station a sublime dwelling place for the men isn't worth doing. Time comes when they simply can't keep the men out of jail—but there that is all a part of the hilarious story.

THANHOUSER "MYSTERY" STORY.

Harold MacGrath, author of "The Adventures of Kathlyn," will arrive in New York City from Italy, April 10, for a conference with C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, and J. Medill Patterson, of the Chicago Tribune, to arrange the details of "The Million Dollar Mystery," a serial photo-play, which will appear in the Chicago Tribune and other newspapers throughout the country, beginning June 21.

Lloyd F. Lonergan, scenario editor of the Thanhouser Corporation, is now at work upon the scenario from which Mr. MacGrath will write his story.

No effort will be spared by Mr. Hite to make "The Million Dollar Mystery" the most stupendous production thus far attempted in the motion picture industry.

Marguerite Snow, Flo La Badie, James Cruze and Sidney Bracy, will carry the story of love, intrigue and mystery through which cascades thrill after thrill. The work of this famous quartette of players makes certain the success of the production.

Notes of the Trade.

Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley, co-directors of the Rex company at the Hollywood Universal studios, have just completed the production of a split-reel comedy entitled, "Waterloo Peterseb, Cameraman." The comedy is of double interest not only because the Smalleys produce it, but as well because a motion picture cameraman, the man who is never seen but whose work is always present in the picture, is made the subject of the offering. Interesting scenes on a busy day in and around the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal are shown. The picture is a record breaker—made in 4½ hours.

As she stuck one reluctant toe into the chilly brine she lost interest in this winter bathing idea, but there were too many spectators to permit of a dignified retreat, so in she plunged.

The alarmists, with an eye ever open to criticism of moving pictures, have of late been circulating reports that their showing was particularly injurious to eye sight. A letter recently came to the Selig Polyscope Company from a well-known scientific authority, stating: "Eyes are not injured, nor is the health of patrons destroyed, much less are the morals of youth corrupted by moving pictures. Just as the playhouse of the olden times eliminated the taint of vice from its performance, so photoplay producers have rapidly learned that the public is intolerant of the vicious and suggestive."

INDIANA.

A MOVEMENT to establish censorship over moving pictures in Huntington has been started by the First Mothers' Club. Their idea is fumigation, and they are proceeding under the slogan "The Cleaner the Better." It may be good to suggest the broom and the mop as insignia for the crusaders. The picture theater managers in Huntington are not alarmed, however, but are taking advantage of the public interest to exploit their business by using only reels that are guaranteed sanitary. The women are appealing to the National Board of Censorship and when a definite plan of campaign has been mapped out the local police department will be asked to co-operate.

H. E. Rosebrough has served notice on the Huntington public that he will go into the picture theater business and handle nothing but licensed pictures that have been subjected to rigid censorship, and will show them in a house that seats 1,100.

In Muncie the population has just voted the town dry, and the saloon men in retaliation are determined to make it "blue" as well. The result has been the filing of affidavits against six motion picture theater owners, charging Sunday violation. The picture men suffer in company with cigar dealers, druggists and candy men, but the prosecutor has served notice that he will not prosecute cases against any but the picture men.

George Deitz, moving picture theater owner in Evansville, shot himself through the heart in a fit of despondency.

The Limit Amusement Company, Indianapolis, has been incorporated with $10,000 capital stock, to do a picture show business. The directors are G. G. Schmidt, H. E. Cohen, B. B. Cohen.

"Absinthe," a four-part Universal feature dealing with absinthe drinkers and the Paris underworld, which was refused permission to exhibit in Chicago by the Chicago Board of Censors, was exhibited in Hammond, Ind., a fact which has aroused the Hammond citizens and authorities to the need of local censorship. Their feeling is based solely on the presumption that what is not good enough for Chicago is too bad for Hammond.

The Essanay, Chicago branch, will film Dr. F. A. Turner, the Rensselaer, Ind., osteopath lecturer, in a number of demonstrations, and at the same time film the town of Rensselaer. The papers of Rensselaer are urging the people to turn out and look prosperous and busy and numerous.

Cash Schlotterback is to open a theater in Ligonier. He has leased the town poolroom. It will take about thirty days to remodel and put the place into the shape Schlotterback desires. A new front of panel effect is planned that Schlotterback is enthusiastic about.

E. M. Mouser, of the Apollo Theater, Indianapolis, is loud in his praise of "The Adventures of Kathlyn," interest in which he says seems to grow with every show.

A. C. Zaring's North Star Theater, Indianapolis, played to big audiences for "The Star of India," the Bioché feature in four parts.

The Peoples Amusement Company house, the Empress, at Central avenue and Twelfth street, Indianapolis, was opened last week. The opening was well advertised and attracted good crowds. Among the visitors the first night were Meredith Nicholson, the novelist, and Governor Samuel Ralston. The house is in a neighborhood of fine homes, and is one of the most beautiful neighborhood houses ever erected. One of the innovations is six boxes of six seats each at advanced prices. The house seats nearly 600 and the admission is ten cents, box seats 25 cents.

Frank Rembusch has bought the Fountain Theater, Terre Haute, of Harry Prentiss. The Fountain Theater was the pioneer picture house in Terre Haute, and Prentiss was its owner.

Henry Wilke has sold the Michigan Theater, Indianapolis.

John W. Witty bought the West Star Theater, 3009 West Washington street, of J. W. Prichard.

H. L. Whitehead has sold the Irvington Theater, Indianapolis, to C. H. Zollinger.

The Southern Indiana Teachers' Association voiced an endorsement of "canned music" and motion pictures at their convention in Indianapolis. A. C. Thompson, drawing and art superintendent, said that stereopticon pictures and the motion pictures would enable the student to grasp ideas and the art of drawing more readily than otherwise. It would implant ideas of grace and movement, enable them to differentiate the commonplace from the dramatic in grouping and posing. The "canned music" was lauded for bringing grand opera and the greatest music into the school room.

Now it is looked upon as only a question of time among Indianapolis exhibitors until the moving picture houses will be closed on Sunday. When Mayor Bell took the collection and distribution of the charity fund out of the hands of the motion picture men the exhibitors thought it would result in bringing the lame ducks to the front with their contributions. But it didn't. In three weeks the eighty theaters have turned in but 53 contributions. Inasmuch as the contributions are due every week, instead of 53 there should have been 240 payments made.

Under the management of the exhibitors' league the theater owner who did not come across with his pro rata share was "jacked up" about it. But under the city management there is no jacking up. From a legal standpoint the whole proceeding is entirely voluntary. There is no law under which the administration can use any means to enforce collection, nor any law by which one offending house can be closed while its contributing brother remains open, so Mayor Bell has intimated he will close all of them without distinction, as the city absolutely cannot and will not attempt to use any means to collect for the charity fund.

The only law by which the houses can keep open is on a basis of being run for charity. To make any pretense of being open for charitable purposes, a certain part of the receipts must be turned over for benevolent purposes. The manager who does not pay up is in violation of the law, but no manager has ever been threatened without paying up, and many of them never pay without being threatened, according to those in position to know, and it is this condition which has put the exhibitors in danger of being closed. The city has given the managers time to see what can be done before taking a final step.

H. A. Bandy, formerly of Baltimore, is now Indianapolis manager of the Mutual.

J. C. Mack, manager of the Peerless Film & Supply Company, became manager of the World Film Corporation office in Indianapolis. The change merely meant a move of a few doors up the hall for Mr. Mack, as the Peerless office and the World office suites adjoin.

W. H. Lawrence of the World Film Corporation office resigned. He expects to locate in Omaha, Nebraska.

The Switow Amusement Company will open a new house in Centerville, Ind. Centerville has a population of 1200. The theater will seat 400. F. R. Hulbert is to be the manager. A Motiograph machine will be used.

Ed Sourbier, manager of the Keystone Theater, Indianapolis, now being built, has bought two Power's 6-A machine for the house.

Lane & Blatt have opened the Unique Theater in Bringhurst, Ind. They will use the Mutual program. The town has no other theater, and it is believed the new picture house will enjoy a big business.

Dudley Williston has become manager of the Crystal Theater, Muncie, Ind. He also manages the Lyric in Muncie.

The effort to close the picture houses in Muncie, Ind., by the Ministerial Association failed. A jury refused to convict John Day, a theater owner, of Sunday violation, holding that the operation of the theater on Sunday was a work of necessity. John D. Dunmeyer, Robert George and Dudley Williston, held on the same charge as Day, were dismissed.

F. J. Rembusch, the Mirror Screen man, Shelbyville, Ind., will build another fireproof, up-to-date movie house in Shelbyville.

A film showing the Detroit Stove Works was used by R. M. Campbell during auto show week to advertise his business.

Jay Lipsett, former owner of the Isis Theater, Peru, Ind., has purchased the Star Theater at Noblesville. Eight years ago Mr. Lipsett started in business with James Chandler, as joint owners of the Palace Theater, Peru.

The night of April 9, during the convention of the Central Division of Associated Advertising Clubs of America, will be given up to a display of advertising films by Louis Sereinsky, of the Motionscope Company. Mr. Sereinsky will present portions of films made for the Westinghouse Electric Company, the Lackawanna Steel Company, Rogers Brown Company, the Ohio Varnish Company, Eli Lilly & Company, the National Mouth Hygiene Association, Heinz 57 Varieties, and the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce films. Mrs. M. R. Oakes will give a reading of "Little Orphant Annie," by James Whitcomb Riley, in connection with the Riley Day celebration film.

John A. Lapp, legislative reference librarian for Indiana, has written a series of features on "Late Legislation for Cities," which has been copyrighted by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. The first article in the series deals with laws enacted by various cities of the country for the regulation of picture houses and the censorship of pictures. Mr. Lapp blames the film companies for the censorship, saying they have been careless of the subject when it promised a profit.

The Empress Feature Film Company, Indianapolis, has found a good advance demand for "The Old Curiosity Shop," by the Hepworth Company of London, which will be released in April.

The Motionscope Company, Indianapolis, has increased its capital stock to $30,000.

The Christian church, Hammond, Ind., has introduced motion picture films into the church service, and will continue their use indefinitely. Rev. C. D. Sharp, the pastor, shows that he has the showman's advertising instinct by getting good publicity for the innovation, into all of which he runs the entire April program of attractions.

OHIO

AN interesting topic was discussed at the weekly noonday meeting of the Cleveland Motion Picture Association at their headquarters in the Columbia building recently. Manager Emery Downs, of the Knickerbocker Theater, gave a lucid and somewhat humorous account of his experiences as a theater manager while talking upon the subject of the day, "How a Poor Theater Can Be Made to Pay." His suggestions were intended to uplift the business, and he contended that no manager could succeed who conducted his theater wholly from the standpoint of dollars and cents. He pointed out the necessity of frequently putting on a show beyond the financial capacity of the house in order to attract discriminating patronage. Mr. Downs was followed by Sam Bullock, manager of the Boulevard and Columbia Theaters, who said the reason so many theaters are "lemons" is because the owners failed to "use their heads" or hired outside brains. He spoke of some fifty Cleveland shows that have changed hands so often the "old guard" could not keep track of them.

Phil Adler, of New York, has taken charge of the affairs of the World Film Corporation, 420 Columbia building, Cleveland, succeeding George Stockton, who resigned. Mr. Adler is well known to the exhibitors of Cleveland.

A film with a little romance running through it is being used by the Sherwin-Williams Co., of Cleveland, to advertise its paints. The popularity of the picture is attested by the fact that twenty-two copies of the film are in service, while 750 reservations have been scheduled for coming months. It runs twenty minutes and tells the story of how one town "cleaned house" by mowing lawns and painting.

Fred Jacobs, of Coshocton, received the contract for erecting a two and one-half story brick motion picture theater in that city. E. O. Selby will own the theater, which will be constructed at a cost of $20,000.

The Columbus Theater Equipment Company has been organized to operate in Columbus with a capital of $10,000. Leo E. Dwyer, C. C. Walcutt, E. R. Walcutt, E. A. Witt and C. C. Williams are incorporators.

M. J. Makoff is erecting a three-story building at 2518 Scovil ave., Cleveland, and a motion picture theater will take up part of the ground floor. The building will cost about $19,000.

A theater containing 1,000 seats will be erected in Prospect avenue, east of East 9th street, Cleveland, soon, by the Fireproof Theater Company, recently incorporated. Motion pictures only will be run. The company is composed of Cleveland business men who own property in the vicinity, and they have taken a ninety-nine year lease on the lot on which the house will be built.

Abe Pottiker is again a theater manager. After a few months in the feature film business he has disposed of the Standard Films Company and taken a lease on the Troy Theater, 3344 Fulton road, Cleveland. The Troy was built about a year ago and is modern and well equipped, with 750 seats.

Judge Frank W. Geiger, of the juvenile court at Dayton, has taken exception to some of the subject matter of motion pictures exhibited recently. Dayton exhibitors appeared to be in accord with the jurist in his criticism of certain films that did not pass the Ohio censorship.

"Less the nearest Exit" is a warning that is running on many screens of Cleveland motion picture houses. The "stunt" follows the request of Director of Public Safety Benesch as a part of the city's campaign for safety against fire dangers.

The Theater Supply Company has been incorporated by R. L. Miller, R. F. Machamer, D. F. Felmly, Frank E. Ream and Ford H. Schumacher, to operate at Akron. It has a capital of $100,000.

Headquarters of the International Exposition of Motion Picture Art at Dayton is planning some sort of legislation to restrict the speed at which films are projected. It is maintained that for proper exhibition it should take sixteen and three-fourths minutes to run off 1,000 feet of film. Clem

Kerr, who is directing convention arrangements from headquarters, will invite the Ohio Opticians' Association to attend sessions.

The Orpheum Theater, Wade Park avenue, Cleveland, built seven years ago by J. A. Morris and conducted by him since that time, changed hands recently. C. L. Smith, for a number of years a resident of Cleveland, has taken a lease for five years at $15,000. Mr. Morris was one of the first exhibitors to build a large house in the outlying districts of Cleveland, and the Orpheum was constructed at a cost of $25,000.

Actors at the Miles Theater, Cleveland, cannot have their Monday rehearsals on the stage, because the house plays moving pictures in the morning. They rehearse in rented rooms.

The Fairy Theater, at Kent, is having great success with feature film programs.

Twelve motion picture operators who failed in the first examination at Cincinnati underwent a second examination in the city council chamber. Complaint was made that the first examination was not of a practical nature. Six applicants who passed a previous test were subjected to the second. In the attic of the city hall they had to operate machines which had been tampered with by the examiners so as to establish their ability to correct small defects.

The Independent Features Company, Incorporated, is the name of a new company organized to handle a program of features for the State of Ohio. Its officers are: Nelson F. Evans, president; I. W. McMahon, vice-president; C. F. Evans, secretary, and Jerome M. Jackson, treasurer. The company has established offices in Cleveland, Cincinnati and Toledo, and is distributing a feature program of twenty-six reels each week with a daily change for all its patrons. Messrs. Jackson and Evans were in New York the first week in March and made contracts for the entire program of the Exclusive Supply Corporation and the Helen Gardner, Gloria, Apex, Criterion, Kennedy Features and Pasquall productions. A buyer will be kept in New York continually to select features for the new service. All purchases will be made to include the exclusive rights in Ohio. The company has its Cleveland exchange on the second floor of the Commercial building, with Mr. Evans in charge.

The Alhambra, Euclid avenue and East 105th street; Olympia, East 55th Street and Broadway, and Globe, Woodland avenue and East 55th street, Cleveland, have been taken over by the Central Amusement Company, of which A. R. McCandlis is president and general manager as well as owner of practically the entire stock. Mr. McCandlis, formerly of Minneapolis and Chicago, has been interested in the motion picture business for about two years, and he is giving his personal attention to the management of the three theaters.

The Star Theater, burlesque throughout the week, has inaugurated motion pictures for Sunday, and is running features. The first Sunday of films brought a well crowded house throughout the afternoon and evening. "Judith of Bethulia," a four-part Biograph subject, was exhibited along with several comedies.

Fostoria will have a $10,000 motion picture house in the building to be erected by Charles Crocker at Main and South streets. The house will have a seating capacity of 400.

Miles Bros. are gradually getting out of the exhange business and are now devoting most of their attention to commercial work. At the present time there is much of this being done throughout California in preparation for exhibits at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915.

J. R. Crone, manager of the San Francisco and Los Angeles offices of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation, has returned from a twelve weeks' stay at Los Angeles. While in that Southern city he appointed T. W. Johns as resident manager of that branch. Mr. Johns until recently was a prominent exhibitor there, having disposed of his theater about the first of the year. Mr. Crone is also an old-time exhibitor, at one time having conducted three theaters at Santa Rosa, and Mr. R. E. CHURCH.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

THE new theater that Joe Halleman is building at 2912 Chippewa street will be ready for its opening by Easter Sunday. Mr. Halleman's house, which is to be equipped in a first class manner, will seat 800.

Mrs. Luella M. Grimbly, a prominent club woman, is making arrangements to have a selected program of pictures shown to the Mothers' Club in Maplewood, on Friday nights.

The St. Louis "Times," in an editorial anent the agitation for fire preventing laws, brought about by the terrible Missouri Athletic Club fire, and the subsequent disaster when the walls of the burned building fell on the seed store and swelled the list of dead and injured, speaks to the point as follows: "It will be noted that it was a hotel that burned in Milwaukee Thursday morning—not a theater. It was also a hotel that burned in Milwaukee in 1892, when many lives and five millions in property were destroyed.

"It is pretty evident that it is the hotel and the rooming-house that must be watched everywhere—and we would particularly include St. Louis. So long as men are awake and even partly alert, there is always the chance that an alarm will be spread in time of fire sufficiently early to insure the escape of those whose lives are menaced. But when everybody is asleep the dangers are multiplied a hundredfold.

"Let us not become hysterical about the local theaters. At least, not until after we have grappled with the more imminent menace."

The fellow that works the "effects" at the New Grand Central can produce an imitation of sounds almost clever enough to discount nature herself as a noise maker. The writer thought he was balked a short time ago when the Hearst Selig news pictures were run showing the attempts to turn the course of a flooded river by dumping freight cars in the torrent. But not so, the "effects" man was right there with his little imitator, and the clatter he made sounded as much like a box car falling into a river as anything we have ever heard.

Bottenelli and Ferresis, the well-known South Broadway exhibitors, are building an up-to-date, thousand capacity house at 5118-20 Shaw avenue, which they expect to have ready for opening by April 15.

A. S. Aloes, dealers in optical goods and moving picture accessories, whose building was destroyed by fire recently, have established themselves in new and beautiful quarters at 504-506 Olive street.

J. Warren Kerrigan, Wm. Brunton, Crane Wilbur, Kathlyn Williams and Mary Fuller are always crowding each other for top place with Florence Lawrence, Maurice Costello, Richard Travers, Arthur Johnson and King Baggott as close followers, in the St. Louis Times "Print Your Favorite Player's Picture Every Tuesday" contest.

The New Grand Central has treated itself to a radium gold fiber screen. According to an article printed in the Globe Democrat, Attorney John H. Bowcock, of the Building Commissioner's Department, says he has drafted an ordinance that will cause a controversy between operators of theaters and moving picture shows, and the municipal assembly. Bowcock caused a bill to be introduced in each of the branches of the assembly, which provides that "No building shall be used as a theater, opera house, or for picture show exhibitions, having seats for spectators above the main floor thereof, unless such building be a building of the first class, constructed in a manner as prescribed by section 337 of the revised code of 1912 of the city of St. Louis. The bill further provides that owners, lessees, or managers, who shall violate the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, be fined not less than fifty dollars nor more than five hundred dollars. Each day that such building is used for any of the above mentioned purposes shall constitute a separate offense. The ordinance, if passed, is to go into effect thirty days after the approval thereof.

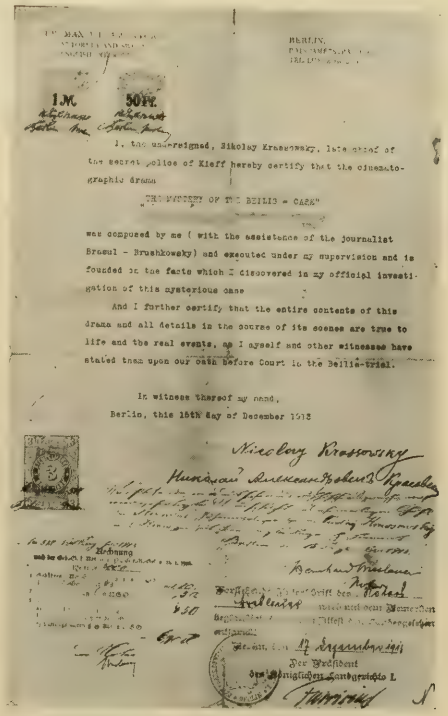
THE ONLY TRUE VERSION



I, the undersigned, Nikolay Krassowsky, late chief of the secret police of Kieff hereby certify that the cinematographic drama

"THE MYSTERY OF THE BEILIS = CASE" was composed by me (with the assistance of the journalist Brasul - Brushkowsky) and executed under my supervision and is founded on the facts which I discovered in my official investigation of this mysterious case

And I further certify that the entire contents of this drama and all details in the course of its scenes are true to life and the real events, as I myself and other witnesses have stated them upon our oath before Court in the Beilis-trial.

In witness thereof my hand,
Berlin, this 15th day of December 1913

Nikolay Krassowsky

THE MYSTERY OF THE

MENDEL BEILIS CASE

A Thrilling Photo-Drama in 6 Acts

Every Incident of this Gripping, Heart-Rending Story Based on Actual Facts.

A Revelation of Brutality and Heartless Oppression of the Jews in Russia by the Man whose Farcical Trial Aroused the Civilized World.

INTENSELY INTERESTING to EVERY CREED or NATIONALITY

THE MOST REMARKABLE MOTION PICTURE EVER PRESENTED TO THE WORLD

IN March, 1911, the body of a young Russian, Andrew Yashinsky, was found in a cave on the outskirts of Kiev, Russia. He had died from a number of knife wounds. A few days later Mendel Beilis, a Jew of Kiev, an honest, hard-working artisan, was arrested charged with the killing of Yashinsky. The Russian police, backed by the powerful anti-Semitic element, brought forth the charge that the blood of a Christian is used at Passover ceremonies. This they advanced as motive for the death of the boy. At once the plot behind the arrest of Beilis became apparent. If such a charge could be "proven" against Beilis pogram after pogram could be incited, thousands of Jews would be massacred and the remnants of the race left in Russia could be oppressed with still greater cruelty.

With the full understanding of this plot, the entire civilized world arose in protest. For Mendel Beilis, no matter how profound and poignant the indignation and sympathy for him individually, has his greatest importance in that he is a type, an object lesson, of the sufferings and tyranny hundreds of his race have undergone and are undergoing in the Czar's land.

Influential and rich Hebrews, fully realizing what a conviction would mean to their race, pledged fortunes in his support. Nevertheless the police went on with the trial. But the sentiment aroused against them was too great. Their perjured and coerced witnesses were discredited, and finally after two years of imprisonment Beilis was declared not guilty and was released. Beilis himself is now in Palestine.

THE ARREST

the only lady manager and proprietor in the state, reports that she has broken all records in Lent with Selig's "Kathlyn" pictures.

S. T. Herman, an exhibitor of Sullivan, Mo., was in town last week, on business connected with his house.

An unusual press of business forced Sam Lears, of the Lears Theatrical Supply Co., to turn down the invitation of L. C. Thompson, of Marshall, Mo., to attend the opening of his new Orpheum Theater, which took place on March 21. The new Orpheum is a new house with first class equipment and a seating capacity of 900.

GIEBLER.

KENTUCKY.

CARPENTER & JOHNSTON, Louisville moving picture photographers, have a deal on to take a full reel of pictures, and make 100 slides, which will be used for lecturing purposes. The deal has not been closed, but will more than likely be signed shortly.

R. S. Shrader, manager of the Central Film Service Company's Louisville office, has returned from a short business trip to the Indianapolis office. Weather conditions have improved greatly in Louisville, and the whole state for that matter, but things are still slow at a good many of the houses. The reason for this season of dullness is the fact that a large number of people are observing Lent.

H. B. Strube is making arrangements with local architects to extend the Empire Theater back to the alley line. At present the house is not large enough to take care of its patronage. He has also bought a compensare from the Ft. Wayne Electric Company.

The Colonial Airdome Company, of Louisville, has ordered six new projecting machines from the Owl Feature Film Company. The company will operate three steel front airdomes, and use two machines for each show. Articles of incorporation for the new company are to be filed shortly.

Albert Schneider, of Louisville, will open an airdrome theater in Parkland.

I. C. Pickard, of Lynnville, has rented three feature subjects from one of the local film exchanges, and has started his road show on its annual tour through the small towns.

Louis Keller & Sons, Louisville contractors, have received the contract for building the Parkland, a moving picture theater, which will cost in the neighborhood of $10,000. Former Governor Thatcher, of Panama, a Louisville attorney, said that the stock was practically all subscribed, and that the Rio Realty Company, which is behind the movement, was in a hurry to get the house completed.

The Louisville Theater Supply was recently opened in the Inter-Southern building to deal in moving picture supplies, including a general line of outfitting materials.

Noland Lindsay, of Bedford, was recently in Louisville, and purchased an electric generating outfit and a Power's No. 5 machine, for a new house to be opened in Bedford.

Fred Sheldon, road representative for the Louisville Kinemacolor branch, has returned from a week's trip to central Kentucky, taking in Lexington, Frankfort, and other Blue Grass cities. According to Mr. Sheldon, the small houses are getting the business in the State at present, and few high-class houses are being put up. W. H. Fain is in Atlanta, Ga., making installations of machines which were recently sold by Mr. Sheldon. Business in the South is holding up very well.

D. Levenson, manager of the Novelty Theater, of Louisville, reports that business has picked up a good deal with his house during the past week, due to the improved weather conditions. The two-reel Imp "The Silver Loving Cup," in which Leah Baird and Alex. Gaden play the principal parts, made a big hit as a Sunday performance at the Novelty. The three-reel Warner feature, "The Mystery of Three Faces," and the single-reel Rex "Kidnapped Pugilist," staged by Robert Leonard, in which Jimmie Clabby, the middleweight champion, and Harry Tenbroeck, his sparring partner, are the principals, were part of the day's bill of six reels.

L. J. Dittmar, president of the Majestic Amusement Company, of Louisville, was away from his office for several days recently. He had an attack of grippe, which kept him housebound.

J. H Stanford, Jr., of the Orpheum Theater, Lexington, is busy making arrangements with the entertainment committee of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Kentucky for the big convention to be held in Lexington in June.

The Louisville Photoplay Association has not had a meeting for several weeks. President L. J. Dittmar said that things were moving so nicely in the picture business of the city that it was not necessary to hold any meetings at present.

James Fisher and W. C. Fisher, of Lexington, recently leased the Kavanaugh building, at Lawrenceburg, Ky., for a term of years, and expect to get an up-to-date motion picture house in operation in a short time. The new house will have a seating capacity of 250. Elmer Jones will be employed as operator. James Fisher operates picture theaters at Owensville and Versailles, Ky.

M. I. Stock, of Knoxville, Tenn., has succeeded J. P. Masters as manager of the Princess Theater, of Hopkinsville. He was at one time manager of the old Princess, which was located on Main Street.

Manager Wilkerson, of Mt. Sterling, has named his new house the Maxine Elliott. The name was selected from a large number which had been submitted, and the prize of $10, in tickets was awarded to Mrs. James H. Stamper.

Manager Simon Switow, of the Garrick Theater, Madisonville, is making a special campaign for patronage. A diamond ring is being offered to the most popular young lady in Madisonville. A coupon good for ten votes is being given with every ten-cent admission, and the buyer of the ticket may vote the coupon for whomever he may see fit. The ring is on display in the window of the Hollinger jewelry store.

Rodney C. Davis and Rankin Kirkland, of Paducah, are having plans made by A. L. Lassiter & Brothers for a new moving picture house to be known as the Kozy Theater. The new house will be at 417 Broadway. The building will be two stories high, and constructed of white enamel, and "Hytex" brick. The seating capacity will be five hundred. The vestibule, which will be sixteen feet in length, will have a mosaic floor. The auditorium will be 92.6 feet in length, and the flooring will be of concrete, covered with wood and battleship linoleum.

Creech & Cawood, of Harlan, have let a contract to C. A. Cawwood for the erection of a motion picture house 32x95 feet, at a cost of about $9,000.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

BUSINESS is none too good among the photoplay houses of Springfield. Lent made a slight difference in the receipts and the strike by the operators cannot truthfully be said to have any tendency to increase the attendance. The trouble began with the formation of a local of the International Stage Employees' Union. Some of the members of the new union declared they were discharged for their activity in securing a charter, but the managers assert they were let go because of inefficiency. William Canavan, of St. Louis, third vice-president of the Stage Employees' Union, arrived on the scene and has been directing the strike. The only demand made upon the moving picture men was for "recognition of the union." This was refused. The strikers received permission to picket the houses involved, which included all but the Royal, and this was granted by the chief of police. When they began talking to patrons, urging them not to patronize the theaters, a warrant for eleven was secured by W. W. Watts, president of the Vaudette Amusement Company and owner of the Vaudette and Gaiety Theaters, on a charge of conspiracy to blacklist and boycott. The men named were Vice-President Canavan, Walter Bryan, George Hopper, John Whitesides, Charles Carson, George Whitesides, Peter Brown, Frank Palmosena, Charles Williams, Steve Palmer and John Caldwell. The cases were set for hearing March 30. Canavan, after the arrest, issued a statement declaring that all the operators asked was that they be put back to work. He also said they were willing to submit to arbitration. The stage hands at the Gaiety went out in sympathy and an attempt was made to call out the musicians. The local Federation of Labor has gone on record as favoring the strikers and recommending that the "unfair" theaters not be patronized.

Harris V. Hickox & Company expect soon to open its new Vogue Moving Picture Theater at 115 South Fifth street. The house, which will be under the management of Harris V. Hickox, a well known young man of Springfield, is to be summed up as a comfortable and pretty little theater. The plans were drawn by Architect George Helmle, of Springfield, with this idea in view. The overhead washed air system of ventilation will be used. The lobby has a tile floor with marble base, a double entrance gives access from the street and the front of the alleyway. An especially pretty effect is gained in the foyer with panel-work, surmounted by draperies and flanked on either side by handsome mirrors. The interior is decorated in a Tiffany blend. Two Simplex machines will be used for the projection of first run mutual service. A five-cent admission will be charged. Three hundred patrons can be accommodated at a time.

Walter Davisson, of Havana, Ill., formerly pianist at the Vaudette Theater in Springfield, recently married Miss Leona Elizabeth Gribel at Portsmouth, Ohio, where he has been connected with a moving picture theater.

Frank C. Smith, former owner of the Gaiety in Springfield, has sold his lease on the Princess Theater at Decatur to the Finn & Heiman syndicate.

A theater and hotel for negroes at Eleventh and Adams streets is planned by A. Morris Williams, a negro attorney. R. A. Byrd will be manager of the theater, which will seat several hundred persons.

Remodeling of the Unity Building at the corner of Fifth street and Canitol avenue, to be used as the home of the new Princess Moving Picture Theater, has begun.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

WISCONSIN.

MOVING picture exhibitors everywhere should think over this little illustration of what ventilation in a theater means. Dr. H. E. Dearborn, director of the Health Extension Division of the University of Wisconsin, cites the way for photoplay house owners to "reach out and extract dollars from the air."

"The owner of one of the largest chains of moving picture theaters in this section of the country privately attributes his success to fresh air. In the first theater he established, enormous ventilating fans were installed. In his latest theaters, ventilation receives as much attention as decoration, seating, etc.

"Ventilating on a big scale is expensive. Rapidly exhausting the warm air means a big drain on the heating system. Furnaces must be driven hard to supply sufficient heat to warm the fresh air to a comfortable temperature. The man who manages must close his eyes to the shrinkage of the coal pile. It's his business to watch the increase in the cash pile in the box office.

"This astute manager clearly recognizes the fact that an audience's enjoyment is not dependent alone upon the pictures and other entertainment afforded.

"He credits a considerable proportion of his patronage to choice of his theaters over those of competitors through a vague undefined sense of physical comfort and well-being not experienced in the other theaters.

"He says: 'In the ordinary hall, it's a rattling good show in which there is no twisting in seats, shuffling of feet and other signs of restlessness. I know from observation that this nervousness is mainly due to stuffy air. In a perfectly comfortable atmosphere, the patron is not nearly so critical. A reasonably good film "gets across." The average patron doesn't analyze the reason why he is, or is not, enjoying himself. Perhaps I save my ventilating cost on wear and tear on furniture and carpets. I haven't figured that out. I don't much care. I am satisfied to know that furnishing fresh air has been good business for me.'

"This man is making a phenomenal financial success. He is proving that stage magicians and fake promoters are not the only ones who can reach out and extract dollars from undiluted air."

J. W. Spradding has taken possession of the Unique Moving Picture Theater at Sparta, which he recently purchased.

H. F. Johnson is back in the moving picture business at Prescott, having taken a two-year lease on the Odd Fellows building there. He will give theatrical attractions as well as photoplays.

Moving pictures are proving an incentive to increased attendance at the Grand Avenue Congregational Church in Milwaukee.

Charles Chosa and G. A. Van Austeren have opened their new Pearl Theater on Main avenue in DePere, with a matinee for children. MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

EXHIBITORS—and even the patrons—throughout the Middle West are objecting to having their censoring done for them by the Chicago board. The number of mayors and police chiefs who have pointed out the treatment of a film in Chicago and consequently banned it in their own cities is growing daily. Those who have visited Chicago and are well aware that on South State street and elsewhere indecent shows flourish, with lascivious dances as the principal attraction, question the genuineness of Chicago's amusement reform. One middlewest editor points out an attraction which has had a fifteen-weeks' run in the Windy City in an article headed, "Blissful Heedlessness of Nicety?" "One of those semi-occasional nicety tornadoes recently swept some hundred or more reels out of the moving picture houses of Chicago. But it left September Morn blissfully caroling its ribald songs and twirling its insinuating choruses. One's attention is hence turned again to the heedlessness of the average morality sense. 'September Morn' is not only wanton in conception, but also in mechanical construction. It is mental septicaemia. To an accompaniment of loose tunes one is dragged along to degenerate climax in 'Where Is the Pleasure in Wine and Song if a Woman Is Not There?' The singer impersonates a drunken wastrel. The setting is a cafe. Canada ousted the comparatively innocent 'Deborah,' by Abercrombie, and New York demanded the expurgation of George Scarborough's version of vice. But 'September Morn' with its inartistic conglomeration of female forms, outlandish types of men, riot of color, sadly mechanical construction, pathetically inane tunes continues in Chicago to wail to Heaven its inadequacy in the way of entertainment."

A similar protest comes from an Iowa editor, who points out the inconsistency of Major Funkhouser in the following words: "The moving picture censor board declares that 'ornery' moving pictures must go. How about 'ornery' plays and 'ornery' books? We'll venture the statement that there are more really immoral performances being shown than there are pictures, while a sensational scene on the screen now and then is not half as bad as some of the chokings, beatings, stabbings, shootings and poisonings we have seen in melodrama. By immoral plays we do not necessarily refer to the drama of salacious tinge, but more to the openly vicious and indecent spectacle afforded at some burlesque show where words, action and implication are so plain that even hardened devotees of this form of entertainment have been known to lave in disgust. If the photoplay shows a character garbed in raiment true to the period, historically speaking, it is shocking, but if a young woman comes out on the stage attired in nothing but a veil and a few beads and adds suggestive dance, it goes without censoring. A 'movie' character levels a gun at a 'bad man' and the board of censors rise to their feet with exclamation of horror. In a recent drama in this city the leading woman character prepares a subtle poison for her husband and this is art. Read about the wicked persons of the world in a book fully illustrated and you are not doing anything so very bad, but see the same thing on a screen and, heavens! Recently, in Chicago, Mr. Funkhouser has been particularly hard on the pictures, censoring, it is said, with a free hand. Perhaps he does not know of other entertainments worse than moving pictures. Summed up, it seems to us that the photodrama is no worse than the regular stage so far as morality is concerned, and if there be infractions now and then why point out the movies in particular?"

The present charge of $50 a year for five-cent houses and $75 a year for ten-cent houses. He told the council it should be at the rate of ten cents a year for each seat. The architect is drawing plans for a $15,000 airdome to be known as the Washington Garden. Rustic effects, fountains and foliage and shrubbery will give it the proper atmosphere. Landau operates theaters or airdomes in St. Louis, Alton, Belleville, Granite City and Madison.

Cairo probably will have a second film exchange. Fred A. Keller, general manager of the Mutual Film Corporation at St. Louis, made a visit to the Southern Illinois city and found that it had many advantages for shipping. Cairo is located at the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and is well supplied with railroads offering an excellent opportunity for quick service to several surrounding states.

Sparta soon will have a modern theater. The plans were drawn by the same architect who designed the Grand Central and Talbot's Hippodrome in St. Louis.

The Royal Theater at Litchfield is not particular about changing the house many times in a night.

IOWA.

ANDREW LARSON, of Jewell, has purchased the old Moon hotel property in Nashua and will remodel it for use as a moving picture and legitimate theater. The photoplay, however, will be the principal attraction.

Wrecking of the buildings in Holstein which must give way for the new moving picture theater to be erected by Lorenzen Brothers, has begun.

F. J. Burdette expects to begin construction soon upon a new moving picture and vaudeville theater on West Jefferson street in Vinton. The house which will be 63 x 120 feet, will seat 790 persons. Two high class dramatic attractions will be booked each month, and the rest of the time will be given over to the photoplay and variety.

The photoplay is receiving a great deal of attention in Davenport from police, pulpit, social workers and press. Chief of Police Hans Schramm is exercising some sort of an official censorship, and has made the customary statement that he found "with few exceptions the 'movie' houses were above reproach." Schramm is willing to take the word of the Chicago censors that a picture is good or bad and the verdict in the Windy City is all that is necessary in Davenport. One of the first suggestions for a board of censorship came from Fred Vollmer, county attorney, who denied any freak attempt at exercising authority of reforming something which did not need it. He declared that he was willing to give full credit to good, clean pictures, but there were films being shown which exploited crime and immorality. Harry E. Downer, about the same time, gave an address before the Unitarian Men's Club on "The Wholesome Mission of Motion Pictures." He showed how the films could be used in educational and uplift work, but a mediocre or biased reporter emphasized the part that bad pictures have played in juvenile delinquency. Rev. Frank Cole, pastor of St. John's M. E. Church, took occasion to speak on sensational moving pictures from the pulpit. Although he advocated a rigid board of censorship, he suggested that one way to eliminate the lurid film would be to get behind a movement for the exhibition of only those films of a high moral tone. F. L. Smart, city superintendent of schools, was firm in his belief that some trouble among school children was caused by moving picture shows. He believes the motion picture will be satisfactory in the school for educational purposes and attributes the present evils to the spirit of commercialism which prevails among the exhibitors.

The popularity of the weeklies is suggested in an editorial in the Marshalltown Times-Republican": "The present practical suggestion of moving pictures and educational entertainment in some one of the schoolhouses every week day is not only good advance, but a prophecy. The moving pictures has been devoted too much to the less valuable fields of amusement. Not that its patrons desire silly comedy of the Mutt and Jeff type and silly melodrama to actualities, for they do not. The most interesting feature to a majority of its patrons is the weekly portrayal of news events. Watch the audiences for confirmation of this assertion."

The Grand Theater at Manning has been purchased by the owners of the Crystal, who now have a monopoly on the photoplay business in that city.

A five and ten-cent store in Clinton gave away 500 free tickets to the Best Moving Picture Theater to the first 100 school children calling at the store on a certain date.

W. Irving Saul has purchased an interest in the Star Photoplay Theater at Carroll from L. H. Anderson, and the firm is now known as Fisher & Saul.

Buildings are being razed in Battle Creek on the site of the new Luna Theater, which will be erected by J. D. Aarnock.

Charles Nott expects to have his new opera house at Sutherland completed sometime in June.

The Happy Hour Theater, at Cherokee, has added C. W. Salsbery, Max Campbell and Mark Bronson to its musical staff.

The building at Pocahantas, which has been occupied by the O'Brien drug store, has been sold to Thad Thornton and O'Donnell & Sharpe, and will be converted into a moving picture theater.

A. E. Cornell, of Postville, Ia., has purchased the Mission Theater, in Monrovia, Cal.

The policy of the new Parkside Theater, at Lyons, will be to operate a five-cent show, except when it has special multiple-reel features. Herman Lubr, of Chicago, will be in charge of the projection. A plaster composition curtain will be used. The new house, which was erected at a cost of $20,000, is owned by a stock company of which W. H. Parker is president; John Galvin, vice-president; Charles Parker, secretary, and L. P. Tritschler, treasurer.

THE NAVAJO BLANKET (Special—2 parts—April 15).

In the silent, sun-kissed valley
Where the Navajoes abided,
Mona, loved and woed by Gontzo,
At her loom the blanket fashioned.

Work on the blanket had barely been started when Mona consented to be the chief's squaw. So,
Wedding guests were bidden thither,
To the mating of the lovers;
Friendly Shoshones, decked in feathers
Sat in peace at Mona's wedding.

Shortly afterwards, the Navajo braves left for the hunting grounds. None but the very old and the very young stayed with the women.

Then Apaches, savage, vengeful,
Restless through twelve moons of quiet,
Swore the Navajoes to battle.

The Apaches descended upon the defenseless Navajoes and captured them. Mona, however, escaped and went to find the braves of her tribe. While on the journey, her first-born came. It was with their child in her arms that she came upon Gontzo. Wild with anger, Gontzo fell upon the treacherous Apaches, scattering them to the winds.

Mona returned to the weaving of the blanket, placing thereon the story of her marriage, the Apache attack, the coming of her first-born, and the Navajo vengeance. Then,

From the East there came a trader
To the village of the valley.

He purchased the blanket and later sold it to a wealthy tourist.

And the paleface owner proudly
To his fellows tells the story
Of the patient Mona's weaving,
As the patterns in the blanket,
So the loom of life had fashioned
Joy and sorrow, love and anguish,
In the heart of gentle weaver.

A RACE WITH THE LIMITED (April 17).—Ruth, a telegraph operator, is engaged to Billy, a lineman. Her flirtations with the men on the road cause frequent quarrels between the lovers. Her mind distracted by one of these flirtations, Ruth gives the conductor of train No. 7 wrong orders. Later, comes the terrible knowledge that because of her carelessness, the train is rushing to meet the express coming from the opposite direction. In her extremity, Ruth sees Billy approaching on his motorcycle. She tells him of the collision which threatens the lives of the scores of passengers. Billy mounts his motorcycle and, taking a short cut, goes in pursuit of No. 7. Just as he overtakes the train, Billy's motorcycle breaks down. When about to give up in despair, Billy sees a semaphore by the side of the track with the signal set at "Proceed."

Whipping out his revolver, the boy shoots at the semaphore wires, severing them. The signal springs to "Danger," as the train approaches. The engineer brings his train to a halt. At the same instant the express speeds around the curve. The sight of the train ahead causes the engineer to clap on his emergency brakes. The express comes to a stop just as the cowcatchers of the two trains meet. His quick wit brings promotion to Billy. Ruth, her folly brought home so forcibly, is cured of her flirtatious habits forever. But Billy takes no chances. He informs her that there is just one position she can fill without being a menace to the road's passengers—that of his wife. Looking up into his face, Ruth meekly agrees.

THE FIGHT ON DEADWOOD TRAIL (April 18).—Makotoch, a Sioux chief, and his daughter, Red Wing, are attacked by a band of Apaches under Black Serpent. The Sioux chief is badly wounded. Later, Ochoa, a half-breed, sees Griggs, a miner, receive a bag of money in exchange for gold dust. The half-breed summons his band and descends upon Griggs' cabin. The Mexicans capture Griggs by a ruse and steal his money. Marian, the miner's wife, is foiled when she tries to aid her husband.

The thieves bind and gag Griggs. An hour later, Ochoa and his men halt near the Sioux encampment and divide their spoils. Red Wing comes upon the bandits and overhears them discussing the robbery. The Indian maid hastens towards the Griggs cabin. Red Wing tells the miner of the bandit's whereabouts. Griggs, about to follow the thieves, is restrained by Red Wing, who suggests that he come to the camp of her people and get their aid.

Black Serpent and his men come upon Ochoa's band. The latter are playing cards for the money they have stolen. The Apaches' request to be allowed to sit in the game is granted. Makotoch listens to the story told him by Griggs. Calling the warriors of his tribe, he cautiously makes his way to the spot where the thieves are gambling.

A shot rings out, and one of the Mexican bandits falls with a bullet through his throat. The bandits and Apaches spring for their guns and a desperate battle ensues. One by one the bandits and their allies fall. Griggs, wild with rage, leaps upon Ochoa and engages the half-breed in a deadly knife duel. The Sioux overpower the foe and then form a circle about Griggs and his enemy. A sudden thrust, and Ochoa falls with Griggs' bowie knife in his breast.

ESSANAY.

PIERRE OF THE NORTH (April 14).—Pierre, a trapper in the great Northwest, catches a season's prize, a Silver Fox. Rene Bennett is fortunate in catching the mate. The two men are explaining to a trader, when Pierre discovers that his Silver Fox has disappeared from his sled. The trapper accuses Bennett and the latter is shot. Pierre flees and is seen later in the home of Mrs. Bennett, where she secretes him from the Northwest Mounted Police. Pierre later saves Mrs. Bennett from death, by carrying her to town, where he faces the man he had shot—her husband. The climax comes when a half-breed tries to sell Pierre's prize. The husband forgives the trapper—the half-breed is placed under arrest and all ends happily.

—AND HE CAME BACK (April 15).—Mr. Secondchoice becomes very much peeved when he discovers early one morning that his wife has decorated the living room with photographs of her first husband. Wifey becomes angry and leaves the house, after her husband had torn the pictures from the wall and stamped upon them. She is about to return home to mother, when she meets Horatio Algernon, a would-be actor, who looked enough like her former husband to be his brother. Wifey conceives a great plan. The actor is taken into her home as her husband, while Mr. Secondchoice is tied to the dog kennel in the backyard. "Hamfato" invites a number of his friends to the house for supper and a good time reigns supreme, until hubby is freed and swings the club of authority. There are many unusual and interesting comedy scenes that will keep you in a continual uproar.

HIGH LIFE HITS SLIPPERY SLIM (April 16).—Slippery Slim loves work so much that he sleeps right alongside of it. Sophie, his wife, becomes disgusted and finally reprimands him. Slim's pride is hurt, so leaves a farewell note to Sophie, telling her that he has gone to commit suicide. Sophie rushes for the doctor and he in turn rushes out to find Slim, and finally does, asleep in a barrel. In Slim's open shoe the physician pours some "Carbon Disulphide Highlife." Then things begin to happen. Like a shot from a cannon he bolts with the barrel up and down the street, in the house and out. When the effects of the "Highlife" finally wear off and Slim settles down, he decides to seek revenge, and his revenge is sweet. He gives everybody in town some of the "Highlife" and then things happen by the score.

To make sure that his deputy, Broncho Billy, will not interfere, he removes the lead from the cartridges in his gun. That afternoon Broncho meets with a rattler—tries to kill it, but discovers that his shells are harmless. He quickly reloads and sends the snake to the happy hunting grounds. The sheriff tries to kill his deputy, but Broncho returns the shot and wounds him. The deputy is finally made sheriff of the county and the would-be thief repents for having tried to steal and kill.

BIOGRAPH.

THE MASTER OF THE STRONG (April 6).—Outside of his world of finance, the master of men has thoughts only for his small motherless daughter. Bank presidents wait his bidding while he humors the child, and a rival railroad is completely crushed. Yet all his wealth and power, the most modern scientific apparatus and medical skill are for naught, when life's big reaper claims little Pearl.

WHEN A WOMAN GUIDES (April 9).—At first the trick the president of the Women's Political League played upon the mayor failed. That he might see things as they exist, she told him she lived in the tenements. His party bosses owned those tenements. The bill passed, his chance for governor would be gone. Yet law it became, and the mayor realized wherein lay his strength.

RINGS AND ROBBERS (April 11).—No doubt about it, she was a fickle young dame. "Keep away from your other flames," ordered the boss. Did she do it? Next day they all piled into the office with rings. One was a cop. "Robber," he shouted. The office boy's latest was the reason. That was where the boss walked off with his "lady-grafter."

HICKVILLE'S FINEST (April 11).—Each cop was tested and true. Yet, when Inspector Beans called for a photograph of the force at headquarters, it was up to them to look powerful. Good make-ups, yes, but the inspector was so impressed that he came to see. There was a hurry call. Some bluffers got bluffed.

MELIES.

FINE FEATHERS MAKE FINE BIRDS (April 9).—This is a very funny little story of a wayward husband, who was disposed to forsake his own little wife in favor of the woman who has attracted him very much. The woman seems to be well dressed and finely adorned with luxurious clothes. The wife, having greater intuition than her husband, sees that this is all surface, and much to the pleasure of the husband, allows him to invite the second lady home for the week-end. When the wife considers that the visitor has retired for the night, she puts an explosive firework under the bedroom door, having previously searched the bedroom for traces of her removable beauty, and having removed the wigs and other little adornments, she then sets light to the firework. The visitor, imagining the place to be on fire, is compelled to rush out with her bald pate, and unfortunately for her, right into the arms of the host.

BATTY BILL WINS A BABY (April 9).—Seated comfortably in the green pastures near his home, Batty Bill is suddenly presented with a baby, but with his usual dull wits he is slow to realize the catastrophe that has befallen him. When he does so, the giver of this great gift has disappeared. Poor Batty Bill endeavors to leave the baby everywhere, but without success. Ultimately he is, as he thinks, more successful, and is able to give the baby over to the police. A little later he is about to be married, when the police come and insist upon him taking his child. The indignation of his prospective wife is very amusing, and the whole thing causes a great joke from end to end.

VITAGRAPH.

A CORRECTION.

Just as the issue for April 4 was going to press the Vitagraph Company made a substitution in its releases. Instead of releasing the special two-part picture, entitled "The Mystery of the Hidden House," on April 11th, as was announced on page 102 of last week's issue, the company has decided to release "The Girl From Prosperity," a two-part picture. A synopsis of this subject is published below. Exhibitors will please note the change.

THE GIRL FROM PROSPERITY (Special—Two parts—April 11).—Jim is engaged to Elizabeth, Emery. While out sleighing, Jim sees the New York train going by, and tells the girl he should like to be going there. The next evening, in a "little game," Jim holds the highest hand in poker and "cleans up." He tells Elizabeth he is going to visit the big city. She is reluctant at first, but finally gives in. In New York, Jim tries to get fresh with Bessie Williams, a manicurist, but is promptly squelched. Becoming lonely and homesick he confides his troubles to Bessie, showing her a picture of the girl from the town of Prosperity. She begins to like the boy. He gets in with a fast crowd and speculates in a bucket shop, where he makes a fortune.

Carried away by his success, despite Bessie's advice to quit, he plunges and loses all. Down and out and spurned by his "friends," he is on the verge of suicide when he meets Bessie, who persuades him to go back to Prosperity, but he is too proud, so she writes to Elizabeth and tells her Jim is ill. This brings Elizabeth and her married sister to New York. Bessie tells them "Jimmy is a good boy, but an awful fool!" Elizabeth is angry at the girl at first, then indignant at Jim as she learns of his adventures and downfall. But Bessie induces her to see him before judging too harshly. Bessie brings Jim to the hotel and pushes him into the room where Elizabeth awaits. Realizing from his care-worn face he has learned his lesson, she forgets about the scolding she was to give him, and seals her forgiveness with a kiss. Bessie, behind the curtain, watches the reconciliation she has brought about and goes back to her work light-hearted.

AN EASTER LILY (April 10).—Sonny Jim is playing in the yard when Mammy Jackson, the wash-woman, enters the gate, followed by a little pickaninny. Sonny asks the darky her name. She replies, "Mah name's Lily." Sonny's mother receives word from her sister Kate that she is to spend Easter with them, and will bring her five children. Brother John, a military officer in the Philippines, also writes he is coming. Mother is delighted, and soon all is in preparation. Sonny nearly ruins his clothes, when he gets into the jam closet. Mother gives him a scolding, and he is again washed and dressed. Auntie arrives and Sonny is an interested observer as she shows mother her children's new Easter clothes. Sonny thinks everybody has new clothes for Easter, but when he speaks of it to Lily, she cries and says, "I ain't got none." Sonny, feeling sorry for her, provides her with a full outfit from his little cousin's clothes. He then tells her to come to church to-morrow where she can sit with his folks. Uncle arrives and is warmly greeted.

Next morning, there is great excitement; nearly church time and one of the children's clothes missing! Aunt Kate, finally dresses the deprived one in her traveling clothes and all leave for church. Led by the General, they walk proudly down to the front pew. Sonny hangs back outside, and pretty soon, Lily is discovered gorgeously arrayed in white. To the huge amusement of all, he drags her up the aisle and into Daddy Jim's pew. Daddy later asks Sonny why he did it, and he replies, "'Cause nobody 'membered Lily at all." He is forgiven and Aunt Kate good-heartedly gives the little colored girl a neat little dress.

With the kind permission of the Deutches Theater, Berlin, we have secured the original cast of that famous playhouse, including the justly celebrated for the production of

A VENETIAN NIGHT

a spectral tragi-comedy in four acts written by Carl Vollmoeller and produced by

MAX REINHARDT

The Original Play as given at the Palace Theatre, London

In no motion picture of modern times has artistic production been so triumphant. We are carried along thru the picturesque waterways of Venice, past the quaint bridges and the stately palaces of the Doges, to take part with the intensity of a dream, in a drama of love, hate, mystery and murder. . . . Not only do we see beautiful Venice with realistic accuracy, but we pass with the poetic Young Stranger into the Land of Dreams. Gradually we lose consciousness of the waking world and we mix with a host of fantastic characters who make us shudder. Thus we wonder and laugh, yearn and sigh, shiver with apprehension and shudder with horror, as the events of this dream masterpiece unfold themselves upon the screen.

Agnes, her roommate, being told the news, has forebodings, but says nothing. Griscom finally suggests that they live in liaison. Horror-stricken at the realization of his evil nature, she repulses him, and the following day is discharged. Unable to find work, Agnes pays her room rent, and Paula, rather than be a burden to the girl, leaves their apartment. She is struck by an automobile owned by Harry, the brother of Helene, who is now engaged to Griscom, and carried to the Mason home. Despite his mother, Harry insists that the girl stay with them until recovered. He falls in love with her, proposes and is accepted. Helene, Griscom and Mrs. Mason try to dissuade him from marrying Paula, but Harry is determined. Feeling she is the cause of the strife, Paula goes away, leaving a note warning Harry not to let his sister marry Griscom. Griscom claims the note is ridiculous, but Harry is not convinced and decides to learn the truth. Griscom, fearful of discovery, succeeds by a ruse in getting Paula to an isolated house, where, after she spurns his offer of money to leave, Griscom threatens her. She tries to escape and in the struggle the lamp is overturned and the place set afire. Harry, who has learned of Paula's whereabouts, arrives in time to rescue them both. After the guilty man's recovery, Harry makes him confess his duplicity to his mother and sister, and leave forever. Mrs. Mason and Helene thank Paula for their escape and Harry again proposes to Paula, who gladly consents.

HE NEVER KNEW (Special—2 Parts—April 14).—Unable to support her baby boy, Grace Devereaux, a widow, leaves him at an orphan asylum. Kitty Rose, an actress friend of Grace's succeeds in securing a small part for her in the same company. Grace leaves her address with the superintendent of the asylum and later receives a letter from him saying that a wealthy widow wishes to adopt her baby on condition that she never make herself known to either of them. Grace finally consents.

Twenty years later, Earle is of age. Mrs. Castro, his foster mother, has chosen Lucille Perrin as his wife to be. Earle tells her he would like to visit Paris first, to which she agrees. In Paris, through an old friend, Earle meets Grace, now Madame Renee, a popular actress. Both are immediately attracted to each other. Although older than Earle, Madame Renee has taken such perfect care of herself that she is still youthful and beautiful and the two are soon madly in love.

Earle asks Madame Renee to marry him. At first she refuses, saying she is too old. He will not be denied and she finally agrees, provided he secures his mother's consent. Mrs. Castro meets Madame Renee and tells Earle "She is charming, but too old for you." He defies his foster-mother and pleads so, with Madame, that she finally consents to an immediate marriage. Mrs. Castro begs Madame to give up Earle, saying, "Suppose you had an only son, wouldn't you do the same." After battling with herself, Madame goes away, leaving a farewell note for Earle. He is stunned when he reads it. Later, Madame is ill and begs permission to see her boy. Her request is granted provided she does not reveal her identity. To her horror, she finds that her boy is none other than the man she was about to marry. She falls in a faint. Earle and his mother rush to her and Mrs. Castro realizes that Madame Renee is Earle's mother. Madame recovers and pleads that she never reveal the truth, which Mrs. Castro promises. Madame takes a last look at her boy, he kisses her and she dies. Mrs. Perrine and Lucille enter and Mrs. Castro soothes the boy, thankful he never knew.

THE CHICKEN INSPECTOR (April 15).—He is the talk of Jimpsonville, a typical village cut-up, and his name is Willy Wildwave. He visits New York dressed in loud college style. A street fakir talks him into buying a "Chicken Inspector" badge. He explains the privileges of the badge and Willy says, "I'm on!" He returns home with the badge and a rubber stamp reading "Approved by Chicken Inspector No. 23," and proceeds to examine and stamp everything that looks like chickens, even to reviewing the "squabs" and "broilers" in a young ladies' seminary. The principal sends for the constable to arrest him, but when Willy shows his badge, they surrender. The seminary girls file out in capes and gowns and the "Chicken Inspector" gives them the "once over." Willy next decides to "inspect" the burlesque show. The manager apparently "falls" for his talk, but in reality conspires with the company to "fix" him. The burlesque girls are lined up and, after Willy signifies his approval, march out. At the manager's signal, the actors and stage hands make a rush for Willy, armed with all sorts of weapons. He grabs a "prop" tree and it goes over with him, the whole crowd piling on top. Scrambling to his feet, he rushes out past the astonished audience. Followed by a big crowd, he finally dodges into a henhouse. The owner, hearing a suspicious noise, pokes a shotgun in and fires. Willy, with a shriek of pain, rushes out and is grabbed by the owner. He breaks loose, leaving his badge in the farmer's hand. He then dashes for freedom, nursing the perforated seat of his trousers.

THE KISS (April 16).—Contented and happy, Alice, a little shop girl, smiles satisfactorily as she looks at her little bank savings. Fred, the floorwalker in Berkley's store where she works, is in love with her.

George Dale, a wealthy society man, takes his fiance, Helen Bradley, out riding. Their car is stalled, and in fixing it, his neck-tie becomes oil-spattered. He stops at Berkley's to buy another. Mazie, a flashily-dressed girl at the counter next to Alice's, waits on him. George flirts with her. Alice overhears them and envy creeps into her mind. She decides that the attentions Mazie receives is due to her pretty clothes. After listening to Mazie's conquests, she determines to purchase some stylish attire, herself, and that night, breaks open her bank.

Fred expresses disapproval of Alice's new finery. When George comes to the store again, he is struck with her appearance, and ignoring Mazie, invites Alice to dinner.

They meet his fiance and Betty, her friend. George introduces Alice as his cousin. Helen kisses her on her cheek. Alice has an awakening and her conscience begins to trouble her. Later, when George tries to kiss her on the cheek, she springs up, saying, "No! No! That is where she kissed me because she loved you!" Hurrying home, she casts off her finery and returns to her modest attire. Repentant, George tells Helen the truth and his sincerity wins her forgiveness.

Next day, the landlady's little child kisses Alice on the same cheek that Helen had kissed, while Fred, happy that she has gone back to the simple things of life, adds his kiss to the others. Alice is happy and realizes that contentment is one of the foundation stones of happiness.

INNOCENT BUT AWKWARD (April 17).—Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy are visited by John Wallace, an old friend. A few evenings later, Kennedy is called away, and shortly after, Mrs. Kennedy and Wallace retire. Half undressed, Mrs. Kennedy is frightened by a mouse. She jumps on a chair which topples over, and sprains her wrist. She again catches sight of Mr. Mouse, and runs screaming down the stairs, followed by Wallace in his pajamas, who was awakened. He catches up with her, and she faints in his arms. Wallace, threatened with instant death, escapes into the street, only to rush into the hands of a policeman. After a terrific struggle, the officer takes him to headquarters. Dr. Gray is called to help Mrs. Kennedy, who is nearly ready to drop, with the pain and fear of the outcome of their predicament. The police sergeant also calls the doctor to attend Wallace, who is acting like a raving maniac. The doctor learns both Mrs. Kennedy's and Wallace's versions of the

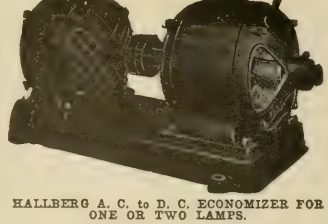
TALK No. 22

"You Never Get Something for Nothing."

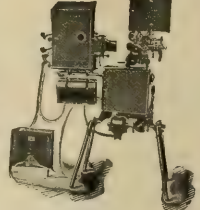
Yesterday I had the pleasure of personally starting the electrical and M. P. equipment in the U. S. Theatre, the largest and most modern in Hoboken, N. J. Mr. Hall, the Manager, being a most up-to-date and thorough business man, placed the order with me for two Power's 6-A machines and one "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C., 60 Amp. Economizer, with double lamp control. Mr. Hall had one experience some months ago when he let a large concern put in a motor generator set, in one of his other theatres, guaranteed to be just as good as the "HALLBERG," and at a price about $100 less. Few months operation were sufficient to prove that this motor generator set was not as good as the "HALLBERG." It stands to reason that you cannot get the same work out of an 800 lb. machine as you can out of the "HALLBERG" Economizer, which for the same service weighs 1300 lbs.

Remember, the fellow who offers you something for nothing is not to be trusted. It is impossible. There is a fair market value for everything, and if you pay it you will get results. If you don't, you have to paddle your own canoe when troubles begin.



HALLBERG A. C. to D. C. ECONOMIZER FOR ONE OR TWO LAMPS.

Wake up, Mr. Moving Picture Man—it is up to you to act. My goods are at your disposal and my guarantee is good. Don't forget that I am distributor of POWER'S, SIMPLEX, MOTIOGRAPH and EDISON M. P. MACHINES, and can make you an ATTRACTIVE PROPOSITION.



I take old machines in trade as part payment for new ones, and I also make liberal allowance on your old rheostats, A. C. Economizers, A. C. to D. C. Converters and Rectifiers in trade for the celebrated "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizers, which give the BEST LIGHT with the LEAST CURRENT.

Factory Selling Headquarters for POWER'S, SIMPLEX, MOTIOGRAPH and EDISON MACHINES, "HALLBERG" STANDARD A. C. ECONOMIZERS, "HALLBERG" D. C. ECONOMIZERS, MERCURY ARC RECTIFIERS, MOVING PICTURE MACHINES and FLAME ARC CARBONS. I EQUIP THEATRES COMPLETELY trouble. He understands how it all occurred, and after explanations to the police, takes Wallace back to Kennedy's house, where there are more explanations, and after Kennedy has begged Wallace's pardon, departs. Kennedy then humbly begs his wife's pardon. Soon she forgives him and the awkward incident is a closed chapter.

THE VANITY CASE (Special—2 Part—April 18).—In a jewelry store, Grace Norris, a wealthy girl, unnoticed by the salesman, absent-mindedly takes a vanity case. She is seen by Fred Wright, who thinks she stole it. At home, she finds the case and, horrified at her unintentional crime, determines to return next day and pay for it, but that evening, at the Uptons, while wearing the case, she meets Fred Wright and discovers he is aware of her theft. He is in debt and rendered desperate by the demands of his creditors, he takes the vanity case from her and by threats of exposure, succeeds in coercing the terrified girl into stealing a valuable necklace of rubies, the following week from Mrs. Holmes, a guest at the Uptons' fashionable villa. She is nearly caught, but manages to escape to her room, where she faints with the necklace clutched tightly in her hand.

Fred Wright is summoned to town by his uncle before Grace can give him the rubies and she hides them in her hair. The jewels are missed, there is great excitement and detectives are sent for, who search all the rooms, questioning everyone. Wright returns to the Uptons, his debts cleared by his uncle, promises to go West and start life anew. Grace is terribly frightened during the investigation, but manages to conceal her emotions.

Later in the evening, Jack Upton, who is in love with her, proposes. She loves Jack, but her conscience troubles her and she refuses. He is persistent and tries to kiss her. His cuff-links catch in her hair and the rubies discered. Astounded, he asks for an explanation. Fred Wright, who has overheard them, steps forward and declares the whole thing a practical joke. Jack believes him and agrees to replace the jewels. Fred, relieved, departs, and Jack takes the girl in his arms. She returns his caresses and consents to become his wife. Mrs. Holmes finds her jewels and Wright, before leaving, gives Grace her vanity case, for which she sends the jeweler its full value, at the same time, explaining how it came in her possession.

QUARANTINED (April 13).—George Le Bird starts to work in the morning and bids his wife and their doll baby good-bye. Soon after Mrs. Van Brone and Mrs. Jack Hallworth make a call with their "babies." While gossiping, one is suddenly taken ill and the butler is sent for the doctor. He examines the "babies" and startles the mothers by telling them the little ones have yellow scarlet fever. He prescribes three sticks of licorice.

The doctor leaves and tells the policeman on beat to quarantine the house. The mothers try to go to get the prescriptions filled, but are sent back. Finally they pin a note and the prescription, which they tie around the dog's neck, and send him to "father," who at the time is coasting down the hill with a lot of other "gentlemen.' He is finally found and a sleigh is pressed into service, and to make matters worse, he is pinched for speeding. He squares matters and gets the medicine, but is re-arrested for trying to enter his quarantined home. The judge is lenient and sends him home, where he arrives in time with the sticks of licorice to save the "young ones' lives." Gratitude reigns and the fond mothers show their delight and appreciation in regular grown-up style.

THE RESURRECTION OF CALEB WORTH (April 14).—When the directors of the bank decided the institution needed a more progressive hand at the helm, they elected Bruce Canfield president in place of Caleb Worth, they gave old Caleb his heaviest blow. His life had been spent in the service of the bank, and as a reward, was thrown out into the world, too old to make a fresh start in life. The directors had not meant to be unfair. Caleb was old, and from their view, past his period of usefulness. Bruce Canfield was young. The bank needed young blood. There was only one answer to the situation.

Winifred, Caleb's daughter, and Canfield had been very good friends. In fact, they were engaged. When Bruce took old Caleb's place, Grace promptly refused to marry him.

The next year old Caleb vainly tried to find a new position. He could not afford to retire, and was too old to learn new tricks, and for a time there was desperately hard sledding. Winifred tried to help by giving piano lessons. Her sadness was changed to acute misery. One day, he sighted Canfield, out walking with his stenographer.

Caleb, discovering his daughter's fondness for the latter, sacrified his pride for her sake. The bank, after a year of the new progressive policy, was on verge of ruin. When the young president submitted his first annual report, he was obliged to confess that affairs were in bad shape. While the horrified directors were discussing the situation, Caleb appeared and told a few things they had forgotten. Youth and progress were well enough in their way, but when things come to a pinch, it was well to fall back on wisdom and experience.

Caleb made good his words, saved the bank, and restored the humiliated Canfield to Winifred.

LO! THE POOR INDIAN (April 15).—A. Hunter, wandering through the forest in quest of game, fell into a trap. He was released by a poor Indian. Filled with gratitude, the hunter spoke as follows: "Let Red Hawk come to wigwam of his White Father, there Paleface may give him much Wampum." The poor Indian, who had a casual knowledge of Cooper, partially understood the meaning and followed him to his home.

The arrival of the noble aboriginal of the primeval forest at the hunter's home nearly scared the hunter's children into "conniption" fits. The hunter left him in the kitchen and went upstairs to prepare a room for his guest. Left alone, the poor Indian accidentally turned on the water in the kitchen sink. After trying to stop the flow with his thumb, his simple and untrammeled intellect gave up the problem and he sat and watched the sink overflow, with naive enjoyment.

The hunter's spouse, called from the cellar by the sudden downpour, caught one glimpse of the red man and fell back into the cellar. The hunter came down, explained things and the startled Redskin was placated with a jar of jam. While licking the knife with which he had removed the jam, the poor Indian came suddenly upon the hunter's daughter and her young man. Conceiving that his hour was upon him, the young man removed his wig, gave it to the savage and fled.

The hunter, proud of the ease with which he had tamed the native, decided to deliver a lecture, using the Indian as an object lesson. The "object lesson" got tangled with a quart of firewater before the lecture began and started to "clean up" with a carving knife. So the hunter called the constable and spoke as follows to the Noble Huron: "Oh, grandson of Chingachgook, you are some speed on your Native Heath, but you are not a Household Pet. Back to the reservation!"

A QUESTION OF HATS AND GOWNS (Special—2 parts—April 17).—Jennie Wiltz fell in love with Bob Megley at school. Jennie, being a plain girl, Bob paid no attention to her. One day Bob tried to pass a note to Annabelle, a pretty little girl seated in front of Jennie. Another boy was blamed, but Bob confessed and saved him from a "rattauing." Jennie longed to tell him how much she admired him, but she was forced to keep it a secret.

School vacation unchanged the situation. Jennie still worshipped Bob from afar, and he remained entirely obvious. At last, Jennie consulted "Advice to the Lovelorn" column, and in pursuance of their advice, opened a millinery shop, with the object of impressing Bob with her business ability.

The millinery shop was a lamentable failure. Jennie did not have the slightest idea about trimming hats. Bob paid no attention to the store. Passing one day with Annabelle, he stopped and laughed at one of the hats.

Jennie, discouraged, went to the city to buy Spring styles. She met Miss Karker, a buyer. A few discreet questions laid Jennie's troubles bare to the listener. Miss Karker decided to help. The first step was to teach Jennie how to dress.

Having undergone this, Jennie was completely transformed. Instead of being a gawk, she was a beautiful woman. Then Miss Karker arranged a party for her protegee's benefit. Bob was at the restaurant. He looked at the girl, looked at her again and again and suddenly realized who it was. That ended the story, for Bob instantly threw himself at the feet of the newly-revealed divinity.

A PRINCESS OF THE DESERT (April 18).—Of all the outlaws of the desert, none could compare with Abdullah, the Great Chief. From Gishon to the River Oualeb his light-fingered men plied their trade, pillaging men of all races, so that none of the ways were safe. When Suleiman, the King, commanded that the wrong-doing should cease, Abdullah laughed scornfully. Nay Moye, capturing a certain rich caravan leader, robbed him and sent him to Suleiman with a scornful message of defiance.

Now Suleiman, the King, was on in years, when the caravan leader stood before him and spoke the haughty words of the bandit, the great King laid his hand on his heart, bowed his head and died. For the great soul of the King could not endure the mockery. But the King's daughter swore by her father's dying breath that Abdullah should die for the wrong he had done.

In the month of roses, as the King's daughter, now queen of the land, sat in the garden, that she heard a man's voice singing in the night. And when she answered his song, the man climbed the wall and spoke with the words of a lover. They soon fell deeply in love. And neither knew the other's name or rank—and neither cared.

At the arrival of Summer there came men to the Queen from the West, bringing with them a bound man, saluted the Queen, and told her that the bound man was Abdullah, whom they had captured. When the Queen looked upon the face of the bound man she trembled. For it was the face of her lover. None the less, she commanded them to slay the outlaw.

Henry dashes wildly along the street, knocking down people right and left. Thinking that he is a thief they give chase, and in order to elude his pursuers he runs into a yard and closes the gate. The crowds run by. Henry comes out and dashes in the opposite direction. Arriving home he finds that wifey has locked him out. Bolton, a friend of Henry's, who looks enough like him to pass for his twin brother, finds him sitting on the steps in tears. Sympathetic Bolton thinks of a plan to help him. Bolton is to break into the house as a burglar and scare the wife and Henry is to come to the rescue and thereby make himself solid. Henry's wife is not the coward they had figured, for instead of getting scared she captures the burglar, locks him in a closet and 'phones the police. Henry is dragged into the house, where he refuses to recognize Bolton. The peacemaker is dragged off to jail as a real burglar, and Hen receives a sound thrashing from his wife.

BUSINESS AND LOVE (April 14).—Izzy Leopold, a peddler, comes to Broken L Ranch to transact business and, unbuckling his pack, spreads his goods before the cowboys and Jolly May, the cook. The boys are in love with May and while she is selecting finery they have great fun with Izzy. Two of the cowpunchers insist on paying for what the cook takes and Izzy gets double pay. Then they start him on his way, count ten and shoot after him.

Izzy objects to such treatment and gets pretty sore. He buys a couple of cannons from a bad man and goes back to be avenged. He makes the boys dance to his music. Shooting wild he puts a bullet in one of his own feet and the cook nurses him. She pays him so much attention that the cowboys get jealous and decide that he must be made to move on. They assemble for a demonstration, but are a few hours late, for the cook had gone off with Izzy to the town to be married, forgetting to get the supper ready, and, as the boys have to satisfy themselves with a box of crackers, Izzy and Jolly May are avenged.

A FATHER'S HEART (Special—2 parts—April 15).—Anna Hoffman, daughter of the burgomaster of a German village, is engaged to be married to Christian Marck, an honest blacksmith. Her beauty and charm attract the attention of the son of a nobleman, and he determines to take her for his wife. The advantage of a connection with a noble house appeals to the burgomaster and he commands his daughter to marry the rich suitor. The lovers decide to elope, but the girl's father catches her in the act and locks her in her room. Then he and the father of the nobleman-suitor arrange for a speedy wedding.

Meanwhile the young nobleman's father meets Christian and taunts him. Christian, in an outburst of temper, loses control of himself and assaults the tormentor. He is captured by soldiers and they take him to the castle. There the old nobleman retaliates by precipitating Christian through a trap door from the council room into the dungeon below. Then he writes a note to the burgomaster, telling him that Christian is a prisoner. The burgomaster shows the note to his daughter and leaves it with her. She studies it and discovers that by a skilful mutilation it can be turned into an order for the prisoner's release.

The day of the wedding arrives. While the bridegroom and his party await, Anna escapes from an upper window and hurries to the castle. Presenting her order, she secures the release of her lover and together they flee. Happily married they live for five years in a distant village. A daughter is born to them and the family emigrate to America. The former suitor, to avoid a gambling scandal, is also sent to America. On the steamer, Anna and her former suitor meet again. Christian has never before seen the young nobleman and Anna, knowing her husband's quick temper, is afraid to disclose the nobleman's identity. The two men strike up a friendship which the nobleman takes advantage of by making secret love to the wife. After landing he continues the practice and his persistence, coupled with the poverty that follows Christian's futile search for work, accomplishes his purpose. Anna and the child desert Christian and go with him. He becomes a drunkard and drinks himself into his grave, leaving Anna with the child. She soon succumbs and Amelia, the child, is placed in an orphan asylum.

Fifteen years later Amelia has become a motion picture actress in Los Angeles. Her aged father drifts across the continent and gets a job in the studio. Her resemblance to his dead wife impresses him, but her professional name deceives him. Sweeping out her dressing-room one day he discovers an old tintype of himself, his wife and Amelia as a child. Then he knows, but keeps his secret. He soon discovers that one of the actors is annoying her with unwelcome attentions and on one occasion follows to the dressing-room, where he sees the man attempt to kiss her. He rushes in and seizing a heavy vase, fells him with a blow. The actor, in revenge, causes him to lose his job. The prospect of being separated from his daughter so unnerves him that it breaks down his resolve. He tells Amelia who he is and to his surprise she manifests pride.

STRENGTH OF FAMILY TIES (Special—2 parts—April 16).—John Brent, a broker, becomes estranged from his wife through his riotous living. The wife leaves him, taking their child with her. She dies later in a hospital, and the infant daughter, Nedra, is adopted by a Mrs. Ford, who has a son the same age as Nedra, his name being William. Meanwhile Brent, having lost all traces of his wife, has reformed and has adopted an infant son, Chris. In later years Nedra, grown to womanhood, is devotedly loved by William Ford. He asks her hand in marriage, but his mother (Nedra's foster-mother) refuses to allow the marriage, believing Nedra to be an illegitimate child. When Nedra hears this supposed secret of her past, she conceives such hatred for Brent (whom she believes to be the man who wronged her mother) that she leaves William and his mother, determining to make Brent pay for what he has done.

Later she has become, through continued disappointments, a social parasite, given to reckless, though no immoral living. William, still firm in his love, seeks her in vain. Nedra meets Chris in a cafe, and knowing him to be the adopted son of Brent, she determines to make Brent pay by making an example of his boy. Chris, by nature a wild, reckless youth, readily succumbs to Nedra's charms. Although she leads Chris to believe she is enamored of him, she holds herself aloof from him except in a manner to encourage his reckless riotous living—the traits of his father. Chris, who is in Brent's employ, soon begins stealing from his father to pay the bills caused by his association with Nedra. Brent, when he learns who is responsible for his boy's downfall, goes to Nedra to forbid her to come near Chris. He believes her to be an adventuress and does not realize she is his own daughter. Nedra laughs at him. Chris, continuing his extravagance, gives a banquet in his own home in Nedra's honor. On the same night Brent, at the office, learns from detectives that Chris is responsible for the shortages in the cash drawer. He leaves for home, broken-hearted, to find Chris and Nedra in the midst of the orgy. William, who has at last succeeded in tracing Nedra, is also there, as well as Marjorie Rand, a young woman to whom Chris had formerly been engaged. Marjorie and William, shocked at what they see, remain in concealment until the arrival of Brent. Brent, in a towering rage, has Nedra brought before him and dismisses her from the house. She retaliates by accusing him of having brought ruin, disgrace and dishonor upon her mother. Brent is shocked almost into insensibility by the discovery of Nedra's identity, which proves that she is his own daughter. Then Chris is told that the woman he wished to marry—and who was trying to ruin him—is his foster-sister. Father and son thus arrive at the tacit understanding which had never existed between them before. Both see the immensity of the folly of their past lives, and both are anxious to revere the memory of the dead mother, and make amends. Brent receives Nedra with open arms, and William stands ready to make her his bride. Chris seeks once more the hand of Marjorie, and Brent for the first time since he caused his wife to leave, is happy at life's future prospect.

A CHANCE IN LIFE (April 17).—Frank Deacon, a convict, vows that if he ever gets a chance he will lead a straight life. His conduct in prison is so good that his term is shortened and he goes out into the world. He finds that most doors are closed on the ex-convict. When he gets work the warden of the prison passes and seeing him shakes him by the hand. Then the man who engaged Frank comes forward and asks if the boy is an ex-convict. The warden, Burton, reluctantly admits that he is. Frank is once more cast out. He decides to take to the open road to be a tramp. He passes the doorway of a cottage, at whose gate a mother still waits for a son, long dead. When Frank comes along, ragged and haggard, she thinks him her son and takes him into her arms. Her daughter, Mary, comes out, tells him that he must stay, as the shock of his going away will kill her mother. So Frank consents to take the dead brother's place. As time passes he rises and prospers until he has become station agent.

Two years later Bill and John, who were pals of Frank's in jail, are released. They throw away the few dollars they have and wanting to make a big haul, decide to rob the limited . To this end they pile logs upon the tracks. Then they go down to hold up the station master and find he is Frank. They are glad to see him and want to bring him in on their game. But he refuses until, angered, they tie him firmly to the table.

In the meantime Mary has been closed into the large vault at the jewelry store where she works by the jeweler's little boy who has been left in her charge, his father being called to the next town. The child, unable to open the safe, rushes out to find Frank. Burton has left the jail and, with a friend, is riding along near the tracks in a motor car. He sees the piled logs and knows what they mean. He and his friend, with the assistance of some others, commence to unpile them. The child arrives at the station and unties Frank. John and Bill coming along the tracks see the crowd and run. Burton and his friend follow. John and Bill see Frank go into the jeweler's and rush in after him. They demand that Frank help them. He cannot get the safe open—then suddenly remembers and pretends to Bill that he will help them—but when he gets close enough he grabs the other man's gun and, holding both up, forces Bill, who is a professional safe opener, to sense the combination of the vault. Burton and his crowd arrive and Frank turns the revolver on them, advising none to move until the safe is opened. When it is and Mary reels out into Frank's arms, Burton understands.

GUARANTEED RAINPROOF (April 18).—Sam Cohn keeps a clothing store. One morning he is moved to add to a painted sign the statement that all clothing is guaranteed. Luigi Savarosa is moved to purchase a suit on that guarantee, and for once Cohn is glad to see a customer go, apparently satisfied. It would have been all right if Luigi had not been caught in a rainstorm with the new suit on. After that it would not fit a boy. He goes to demand his money back, and Cohn fears it is the day of his death and runs from Luigi. Naturally Luigi pursues and there is a chase that leads to many brisk adventures, but in the country Cohn foolishly climbs a tree and from its foot Luigi demands that he throw down his clothes. Cohn does so and Luigi starts home in Cohn's clothes. Cohn starts for home in the suit he sold the Italian and when he gets to his store he sadly looks at the guarantee sign, rubs it out and then enters his store to figure on a fire sale.

A STRENUOUS RIDE (April 18).—Sam Johnson, a big coon, is chased by a bull dog. Sam goes over walls, fences and house tops, with the dog in hot pursuit. On a roof he finds an umbrella; he opens it and attempts to use it as a parachute, but it turns inside out and Sam falls down into a box of mortar. He is roughly handled by the Irishman who is mixing the mortar. The bull dog makes a leap from the house top and again gives Sam a chase. The coon jumps a railroad engine and pulls the throttle wide open. He is carried over mountains, church steeples and skyscrapers. The engine eventually strikes a rock, blows up and sends Sam again into the air. He comes down to earth and a policeman leads him off to the jail.

THE RUINS OF ANGKOR—INDIA (April 14).—A great many pages of the history of ancient times concerns the religion of Buddha and the result of that dogma on the two-thirds of the world's total population which has embraced the teachings of the enlightened one. The historical writings are vague, but the architectural records testify to the religious intensity of the Hindoo Buddhists.

This film is taken from the architectural record. It shows the ruins of the once glorious temples erected in the ancient city of Angkor, India. Among the scenes are the Terrace of the Elephants, built about the tenth century. The King of the Lepers, The God Buddha Brahma, the Indian God of Gods, and various other typical bas-reliefs of the times.

THE PICTURESQUE COAST OF CATALONIA (April 14).—Spain is noted for its grandeur and beauty, hence the building by lovers of "Castles in Spain." But castles built by the wildest dreamers never equaled the real article as shown in this film, which includes the castle of Aramunya, the Can Ferrat Museum and its Phoenician jewels, and the belvedere of La Punta. The film is in natural color.

WHIFFLES' AFFINITY (April 15).—Whiffles runs a small dry goods store in a small town. Imagine his surprise when Vivian Carmen, leading lady with the Moulin Rouge Burlesque Company, enters his tiny establishment. Imagine Mrs. Whiffles' indignation as she watches her better half linger at the task of fitting Miss Vivian with gloves. Imagine, too, Whiffles' chagrin, when, prepared to deliver to the leading lady at her theater that evening six pairs of gloves, he finds his wife unalterably opposed to this arrangement. She strenuously determined is Mrs. Whiffles that she puts Whiffles to bed and locks the door. But our friend's fascination is not easily to be overcome. He steals out and delivers the gloves to his affinity. He receives in exchange a soul-stirring kiss on the cheek and returns home in high glee. But Mrs. Whiffles is waiting for him. Questioned, Whiffles denies that he has met his affinity. But ye gods, he forgets that Vivian has left on his cheek the imprint of her ruby painted lips. Imagine now the rest.

FLOWERS THAT BLOOM IN THE SPRING (April 15).—Now that the spring is in everyone's blood, it would be well to run this short film, which shows the cherry blossoms, the begonia, the Martagon lily, and the geranium, blooming gradually until they finally burst forth in all their glory.

A MAD LOVE (Special—2 parts—April 14).—Naturally of a jovial disposition, Fred Miller suddenly displays a trait of character that excites the amazement of his friends. The reason is not long withheld, for Fred loves Maud Morgan devotedly and begrudges every moment that he loses from her company. But Maud looks with favor upon Fred's friend, Wilson, who basks in the smiles of the fair girl to his heart's content. Many pleasant hours are spent by the couple in their canters over the fine country roads and the enjoyment of the rural life the locality affords. On one of these trips Fred Miller meets the couple and soon he begins to fear the real reason for the failure of his suit. A fiendish desire for revenge against his friend takes hold of the man. He cannot forget the girl he loves so dearly and plans to make his regard effectual by disposing of the rival. With this end in view he scuttles his boat and invites Wilson to go with him for a sail. But the unexpected happens. Wilson manages, to save himself and little dreams of the enmity of the man he still believes his friend.

Not long afterward Miller receives news of the engagement of Maud to Wilson and immediately is born in the broken-hearted man a desire to regain the lost love. Spurred by his mad desire he calls on Maud, but is unsuccessful. In the course of a few months the marriage takes place. Starting on a novel honeymoon, Maud and Wilson embark in a balloon, accompanied by two guests, one of whom is Miller. Soon after ascending to a dizzy height Miller suddenly releases the gas from the bag and the passengers are plunged to the ground. Injuries are slight, however, Miller proves to be the only one hurt severely enough to require attention. At a nearby hotel where he is taken for treatment, Wilson and his bride learn of the hopelessness of Miller's malady.

Several months' treatment in a santitarium finally effects a cure and the patient is again at liberty. Suspicion lurks in the hearts of his friends as to the permanency of the cure, so Wilson and his wife are prevailed upon to go to their country home while Miller is watched by their friend, Tom Jenkins. Miller's unbalanced mind leads him to seek revenge. Upon his release he purchases a revolver and starts in search of those he believes responsible for his plight. The ever loyal Tom is watching, however, and warns Wilson to be on his guard. Having learned of the address of Wilson and his bride Miller starts out in an automobile while Jenkins follows. The chase is close and at times Jenkins has almost perverted Miller in his purpose, but each time the madman gains on him. At last a short turn in the road offers Miller an opportunity of eluding his pursuer, for he thinks Jenkins will continue on his course, but Jenkins follows the track of the leader and crashes into the machine stalled at the turn. It was a fateful scheme of a disordered mind, the execution of which was witnessed by Wilson and his bride, but it worked its vengeance on the sole perpetrator, for Jenkins returned from the catastrophe uninjured.

THE GHOST (Special—3 parts—April 18).—Peter Whitten was the boldest buccaneer of his time, which was early in the 19th century. His piratical deeds and utter lawlessness broke his father's heart and left him an old man before his time. But the pain that Peter's pursuits caused old Ezra Whitten, a wealthy mariner, was lessened by the sterling character of his younger son, Gabriel; and seeing that there was no hope of reforming Peter, the old gentleman centered all his love and hope in Gabriel. Gabriel is in love with Joan Moore, the beautiful daughter of the keeper of Ye Lion Inne, when the story opens. In conversation with her lover one day, Joan confesses that her father is in dire financial difficulties. Gabriel suggests a visit to his father. Ezra Whitten willingly supplies the money Rufus needs and Moore, in turn, gives a note promising to return the money in ninety days. A month later Whitten, the elder, dies. Peter learns of his father's death and straightway goes to the house to collect the Whitten fortune. By the terms of his will Whitten cuts off his son Peter and leaves Gabriel his entire fortune, consisting of some uncollected accounts and a chest of gold, buried on a distant island.

To prove his fairness, Gabriel agrees to divide the buried treasure if Peter will help him locate it. Peter consents and together the brothers set out as directed in a crude map left by their father. They find the treasure with little difficulty, but on the return to the boat Gabriel is caught in a quicksand and though he pleads for help, Peter leaves him to his fate. Returning to the village with the chest of gold and jewels, Peter announces that Gabriel was lost in the quicksands, despite his efforts to save him. Joan is broken-hearted when she hears the news and Peter, visiting at the Inne later on, asks her to marry him, since his younger brother is gone. Joan refuses without much regard for Peter's feelings. The latter is enraged and leaves the Inne. He returns after a brief interval with Moore's note, which is long past due. Peter demands payment of the note. Moore begs for time and Peter grants a day of grace. The next night, despite a fearful electrical storm, Peter journeys to the Inne for his money.

Moore pays the debt and Peter is about to leave, when Joan invites him to pass the night at the tavern and thus avoid the terrible storm. Peter accepts and Joan shows him to his room above the bar. When Peter is safely in the room, Joan turns the key from the hall and locks him in. Peter prepares to retire, but does not feel at ease. He glances at the bed and is startled. He smiles and rubs his eyes, looks again and fear overpowers him, for he recognizes the head on the pillow as Gabriel. Peter tries to flee, but the door to the hall is locked. The window is barred. He masters his courage and even smiles. Peter tries to convince himself that it is all a hoax. He touches the white arm protruding from the bed, but finds it alive and cold. He falls in a heap on the floor and alternately begs and swears and prays. He finds a trap door in the floor, but as he opens it the white figure in the bed assumes a sitting posture and points an accusing finger, which touches and paralyzes every nerve in Peter's body. To shut out the fearful sight, he covers his eyes with his hand. He loses his balance and falls headlong to the floor of the tavern below, greatly surprising Moore, who is talking with his daughter. Despite the fall Peter scrambles to his feet and flees out into the storm.

The figure in white is now descending the stairs that lead to the bar. Moore is fearful, but Joan calms him with the statement: "It is Gabriel. He is not dead." Gabriel removes the white sheet that covers his street apparel and quickly explains to Moore how he was saved from the quicksands by passing fishermen, how he told Joan when he reached the Inne and how Joan hit upon the idea of awakening Peter's conscience. Had they followed Peter they would have seen him in the storeroom of his home guarding the treasure from an imaginary apparition. Too, they would have seen him upset a box that allowed the cases stored high against the walls to tumble upon him. They might have saved his life, but they did not find him till the next day.

THE GOLDEN PATCH (March 19).—[This picture is substituted in place of "The Evil We Do," which was previously announced for release on this date.] Amos Grubbins is a long, lean, lank, stingy, money-grabber, who uses laundry-soap for shaving, and wears hideously patched clothes (said patches concealing much gold of the realm). While Amos loves money, he does not love labor, and his hard-working wife vainly endeavors to get him to spade up their little garden. One night a fire breaks out near Grubbins' house, and he rushes to the scene in his nightgown, intent upon almost any form of loot he can get. His wife takes advantage of his absence and the presence of his patched trousers, to raid the patch for the price of a new dress. Amos returns soon after from the fire, much heated and with a cold in his head. The next day he wants to go afishing, and while grubbing for worms in the garden, he discovers gold pieces. His wife, unfortunately, did not sew up the patch tightly, so that it leaked coin. The result is that Amos, in his mad search for gold, spades up the entire garden and eventually finds all of his gold with the exception of the two pieces which went into his wife's new dress. This was the first day's honest work that Grubbin's had accomplished in a long time, and he paid for it himself.

THE MIDNIGHT CALL (Mar. 31).—Dr. Bronte, a young physician, seated in his library late one night, hears the tingle of the 'phone, and receives a mysterious call in a feminine voice: "They are killing me—come quick—old stone house—Forest Lake." The message chokes to a whisper—then there are sounds of struggle—then silence. As a man of action, he decides to investigate the mystery at once. He calls two patrolmen and a detective, and in an auto they rush to an apparently empty mansion—but the sounds of their knocking bring to the door a shrewish looking woman, and a bearded man with matted hair. They deny making any 'phone call, but a search is made of the premises, the only incriminating thing being that the receiver of the 'phone has been recently broken. The officer leaves the house, but the doctor conceals himself. They, observing his disappearance, conclude to remain on the ground and watch the house.

An hour later, Lawlor, the third member of mystery, emerges through a trap door in the floor, and the doctor observing his entry from his place of concealment, soon after opens the door and explores the passage, discovering Doris Wain, a beautiful girl prisoner, who declares that she voiced the message. The people of the house have discovered the presence of the intruder, and a desperate encounter ensues. Happily, the detective who remained outside, is able to take a hand, and captures the gang. Doris afterwards explains to the doctor that she had been imprisoned for two years by scheming relatives, who had given out that she was dead and tried to gain possession of the fortune left by her father. She also explains to him that she called the police department on the 'phone when she escaped for a moment from her cell, but Central gave her Dr. Bronte's number, and Fate thereby threw her into his hands.

WHEN THIEVES FALL OUT (April 1).—Jimmy Scott, "gentleman burglar," known in society as James Percival Scott, plans the robbery of the palatial Wadsworth home. Sis is a clever female crook, who is in love with Jimmy, but is sick of crime. She pleads with him to make the Wadsworth job the last, and he consents. Bud, another member of the gang, is in love with Sis and madly jealous of Jim. The day before the job is to be pulled off, Jimmy, in strolling in the neighborhood, happens to be on hand when Sybil, the daughter of the house, is hurt in an automobile accident. He, himself, saves and carries her to the house. The family is doubly grateful, likewise Sybil, and he becomes acquainted and is asked to call. He at once becomes violently enamored of the heiress, and postpones the robbery, which excites the suspicion of the gang. Sis, thinking he has grown honest, seeks means of support, and Fate casts her, strangely enough, as a waiting maid at the Wadsworth mansion. She soon discovers Jimmy's attitude towards Sybil. Heartbroken, she seeks the rendezvous of the gang to reproach him. While there, Bud and his pal, Bill Ayres, fight over her, and she is injured. The row results in their discovery by detectives, just as Jimmy comes upon the scene, so he is arrested and incarcerated with the rest. They are all sent away to serve time, except Sis, who is tenderly taken care of by her new-found friend, Sybil.

THE STORY OF DIANA (April 2).—Diana, while visiting the castle of Venus, secures two pet leopards that follow her through the forests as she roams about the estate. Orion, the hunter, is beset by wolves, and Diana looses her leopards to rescue him from the wolves. She immediately falls in love with the hunter; but he, strangely enough, does not return the affection. So she goes to Cupid for aid. This cunning little chap agrees to help her and they find Orion asleep. At the touch of Cupid's dart, he awakens and as usual in such cases, falls in love with the first woman he sees, which happens to be Diana. Venus is displeased over this infatuation. She summons Apollo, the sun God, to protect her, but he, in turn, is displeased over this affair of his sister. He denounces Orion as a coward, but Diana proves him otherwise, as he battles with a leopard single handed, and overcomes him, bringing her the skin of the spotted cat as a test of his prowess. Apollo, however, does not give up, and discovering Orion making love to a sea-nymph, induces his sister to dispatch him with an arrow by mistake. The last scene shows Diana at the tomb of Orion in the forest, mourning her lost love.

THE BOND OF LOVE (April 3).—Broker Trask and his wife, having accumulated a competence, experience a diverging desire—the one wishing for rest at home and the other longing for social conquest. The husband expresses himself petulantly: "Our evenings have reached a point where they bore me," and his wife agrees with him. Trask has visions of his club; she of bridge and her frivolous companions in finery of fashion. The eventuality is that Trask takes up quarters in the club, where he meditates with libations upon the emptiness of his own life. His wife, soon resenting his attitude, through the advice of her society friend, seeks an attorney with a view of separation. "On what ground?" queries the limb of the law. This stumps her. Trask, in turn, goes to his lawyer for advice and in response to the same question, explains: "We have simply drifted apart; mutually grown tired of each other's company. She has social aspirations; I detest them." The lawyer pondering on his response, dreams of his own happy home and the two little ones that toddle out to meet him morn and night. He seizes upon a device never dreamed of by Blackstone. He makes a suggestion that is eagerly seized by his lady client.

At an orphanage, arrangements are made and that night the lonely wife of the broker finds a little baby on her doorstep; so she immediately writes her attorney: "I am so happy. If Jim would come home my cup would be filled, but I won't ask him." The scene advances by a single leap, five years, showing Trask and his wife a reunited and happy couple with something to live for, and every evening is interesting without artificialities.

A MIX-UP ON THE PLAINS (April 7).—Sid Hopkins advertises for a village school teacher, while at the same time, Dan Sawyer comes to town and advertises for a female cook for his ranch. Both advertisements appear in the same issue of a large city paper, and two applicants are secured by mail. As one school teacher has eloped, Hopkins takes precautions to prevent the other from following suit. He sends his handy man to meet the teacher, while Sawyer sends a cowboy to meet the cook. Both emissaries arrive at the station, and become so much interested in something else that the teacher alights from the train and goes into the waiting room. When the men realize their real mission, they observe only the cook, who has been left standing upon the platform. Both insist that they were sent to meet her and it ends in a rough and tumble fight. Hopkins' man is the victor and takes home the cook instead of the teacher; while the cowboy, later discovering the teacher at the station, rushes her off to the ranch.

The cook, confronted with the precautions taken to keep the teacher in a state of single blessedness, thinks she has fallen into a community of maniacs. The teacher, however, who is a failure as a cook, is immediately successful in winning the heart of the chief of cowboys. Sawyer soon finds out the mix-up and goes to Hopkins' house to trade the teacher for the cook. On the way to town the teacher and her lover are married. Hopkins is willing to make the trade, but the teacher shows him her wedding ring, so the laugh is on him, and he demolishes all of his placarded precautions and merely advertises for "a homely old maid to teach school."

THE RUBE (April 8).—Bunny Summers, an awkward yokel, meets Lydia Beebers, a new belle, at the Spikeville postoffice, and is at once smitten with her. He makes several attempts to get acquainted, finally succeeds and takes her to church. Bunny observes in the paper that the "center" on the State University football team has not returned to college, and determines to go to the University and try and secure the coveted place on the team. At first his parents ridicule the idea, but finally consent to his going. Lydia and various natives of the town ridicule him, but do not shake his determination. Bunny never traveled on the train before, and is consequently a green 'un. He takes apples from the news agent's basket, throws his carpet bag in the aisle, and creates a scene all around the car until he is quieted by the conductor. At the college station, he is ridiculed by the "college sports," and one of them tries to sell him a "campus ticket." Bunny, undaunted, perseveres, and when he appears on the football field, he is greeted with jeers. The coach looks pleased, however, for he appreciates the mettle of the young man.

The day of the great Thanksgiving game arrives, and his opponents are ahead. All at once the "center" of the home team is injured and has to be taken out of the line-up—and Bunny is called to fill his place. He stops the advance of the enemy, and when his side is given the ball on the offensive, he tears big holes in the opposing line, and after great gains, he allows the fullback to get through and make a touch-down, winning the game. Bunny is the hero of the hour. The natives of his own Spikeville read an account of the game in the paper, and see Bunny's picture with it. The fair Lydia gets a card from him, telling her that he will be due to arrive on the morning train, so she and the whole village go to the train to meet Bunny with a band. He is no longer the village rube; but a real hero, and nobody knows how to appreciate him more than the fair Lydia.

THE FIRE JUGGLERS (April 9).—When a lovely woman too openly invites the attention of men, she plays with fire. Such a one is handsome Mrs. Leavitt, a self-centered, selfish person with everything that wealth can command. She consults much with her mirror, which tells her she is fair. Her husband brings home a friend, Major Schmall, a brave man, and his war record and medals attract her at once, but her attentions and flatteries happily only bring disgust to the stalwart soldier. She next joins the rush to Alberti's studio. He is the latest rage of society, in truth an unscrupulous artistic adventurer. He at once begins to prey upon the vanity of Mrs. Leavitt, and secures what he is after in the way of a "sitting." Before her picture is completed, however, that vain charmer becomes a worshiper of Farar, a noted tenor, and forgets her engagements at the studio.

In the interim, the crooked artist has used one of his female accomplices as a model, to complete Mrs. Leavitt's portrait. Then her husband receives a curt note from the artist, which informs him that his wife's picture is finished; but he had better view it alone and bring the fee at the same time. Mystified, Mr. Leavitt goes to the studio, and is shown a picture, purporting to be his wife—painted in nude. Of course, this starts something. The artist declares: "It may be a 'fake,' but who would believe it? If you destroy it, I will paint another one; so you had better pay up and avoid scandal." This precipitates a violent fight. The up-shot of it is that he takes the picture home to his wife; she sees the great peril she has escaped, and it brings her at once and permanently to her better senses.

RED HEAD INTRODUCES HERSELF (April 10).—It is aphoristic that people possessing red heads, get what they go after. "Red Head" is a girl, who happens to be at once the fear and the pride of her particular class, a sort of angel child girl, that merrily dominates distressing periods in child life. She introduces herself through the medium of a goat that butts everybody out of the way on the sidewalk. Next she appears at the ball game and proceeds to do things that the boys cannot. When they pitch upon the umpire, she takes his part and vanquishes the crowd, she being as handy with her fists as they with their heels. She is certainly a lively and amusing factor and keeps things going, in a slashing, juvenile comedy.

ALL MIXED UP (April 10).—A rurale tells his neighbor that he has picked out a wife for his son, and the latter shows him a picture of the girl he wants his son to marry; so the rustics shake hands over it. It appears that the sons have secretly married the very girls their fathers have opposed—"the double cross," showing in the photographs. The boys having been cowardly in the first place, in eloping, retain this quality by forcing the girls to break the news to their fathers. This results in a series of uproarious complications that eventually win happiness and satisfaction for all concerned.

A ROMANCE OF THE FOREST RESERVE (April 14).—Elmer Benson, a ranger, while riding his division in the National Forest, chances upon the camp of David Fletcher, his wife and their adopted daughter, Barbara. They have a big herd of goats, and he warns Fletcher not to let them feed in the National Reserve. At the same time he becomes interested in the stepdaughter, who, he feels, is being ill-treated. One day he finds Fletcher's men have disobeyed him and driven the goats into the reserve. He orders them to leave, and during the argument that follows, the foreman covers Benson with a gun; but the latter exhibits his authority, places the foreman under arrest, and takes him to his cabin, deciding to wait until morning before taking him to town. The other herders form a desperate plan to rescue their foreman, which is overheard by Barbara. The men accomplish the rescue, and leave Benson bound and helpless in the cabin. Fletcher then gives his foreman some money and tells him to get out of the state quick. He agrees to do so, but subsequently changes his mind and decides to get even with the ranger. With this in view, he climbs up the top of a cliff which overhangs the cabin in which Benson is lying securely tied. He places a dynamite cartridge in the crevice of a rock so that the explosion will send tons of granite directly upon the cabin.

Just as he has lit the fuse, Barbara rides in, runs into the cabin and frees Benson. Both rush out as an avalanche of rock from above smashes the heavy structure to pieces. Benson captures the foreman, and together with Barbara, starts to take the prisoner to town. With the aid of field glasses he sees that the Fletchers are hurriedly breaking camp. Barbara begs Benson to let them depart, and he agrees, that if she will marry him, he will let them go. So they deliver their prisoner and hunt up a preacher.

A PAGE FROM YESTERDAY (April 15).—Silas, a paralytic, has two daughters and a son. Betty, his particular pride, meets Ned, an artist, from the city, and is soon secretly posing for him. Ned's influence over the girl is greatly increased, when John, the brother, goes to war, and there follows the usual tragedy of a wild, fun-loving young girl, thrown too much in the company of a middle-aged man of the world. Ned, the Lothario, is about to wash his hands of the whole affair and leave for Europe, when Betty makes a last appeal to him and he casts her brutally aside. Then the news comes to the old father, who sends for him and a violent scene takes place, peculiarly pathetic, in the fact that the old man is paralyzed. He demands justice, but the insolent roue laughs in his face and jeers at him and his daughter, until nature rebels and can stand no more. Miraculously, the paralytic's strength returns to him, and he is about to crush the brute under his heel when his soldier son returns. He saves his father from murder, and at the point of a gun compels the artist to marry his sister. Then they at once leave the scene.

Seven years pass and no word comes from Ned. He becomes a cocaine fiend, and has but a short time to live—and now, looking death in the face, he longs to see his child once more and do what he can to redeem the past. As a tramp, he returns to the old village, unrecognized. His one sight of his child and his last good-bye to Betty, to some extent palliates for the past. He goes out of their lives forever, and then it is found he has provided handsomely for the future, and tried at least to straighten out the Page of Yesterday that was so frayed and blotted with sin and shame.

A FLIRT'S REPENTANCE (April 16).—When Mary Custer thoughtlessly turned from her husband to flirt with Jack Legree, it was only through her own bravery that she at last succeeded in undoing the harm that her coquetry created. John Custer was a splendid Southern gentleman, a type of the ante-bellum days—a kind husband to his young wife Mary, who really loved him devotedly. He was studiously inclined and not overfond of the ballroom. One night he and his wife attended a dance at a neighboring plantation, and Jack Legree, the gallant of the neighborhood, set out to entangle Mary. She was very young, an acknowledged beauty, and for the moment fell under the spell of his cajolery. She walks out into the moonlit garden with him, and he wheedles her into snipping off one of her lovelocks and to give to him as a keepsake. Just at this moment, the husband, who has grown suspicious through an incident earlier in the evening, happens on the scene and assails Legree. He beats up the unprincipled young whelp, and severely orders Mary into the house. Then he strides away to his own home, determined to have done with his wife. She follows in her carriage, and begs him not to misjudge her; but he imperiously orders her out of his sight.

Later, Legree sends a challenge to Custer to fight a duel at daybreak in the Oak Clearing. Mary intercepts the epistle and decides to offer herself up as a sacrifice to her own foolishness, by appearing in place of her husband, saving him from the possibility of death. She secures one of his suits and appears at the dueling place with her identity undiscovered. The old negro whom she has taken into her confidence, however, has told his wife about it, and as she cannot keep a secret, the news comes quickly to John Custer. He rides to the scene posthaste, and separates the contestants just as they open fire. Legree has shot Mary and she falls wounded. Custer carries her back to his home, his love for her is renewed, and on the bed of convalescence, she repents her folly and pledges her fealty to the only man she really loves—her husband.

RED HEAD AND MA'S SUITORS (April 17).—The widow Murphy has two admirers—the ardent policeman, who is so spick and span on his "beat," and big Schmidt, the burly German, who has a large bank account—and both are as willing as she. Then Red Read, the angel-faced demon child, intervenes. She drops a cat from an upstairs window upon Policeman McGuire's neck, while he is on his way to interrupt a visit of Schmidt to the widow, in the back yard. All hands become tangled up in clotheslines and there are many funny falls.

When the suitors are again lured into the security of the widow's parlor, Red Head discovers a hole bored in the floor of the upstairs bathroom directly over the visitor's head. The plumber's melting pot suggests hot possibilities, so she pours sizzling solder down on Schmidt's head. He flits out of the scene, allegro. The widow is much puzzled at his quick exit, and returns to greet Policeman McGuire. He has hardly been seated under the hole in the ceiling and has a ring in his hand, when more lead comes sputtering down and hits him on the back of the neck. He makes a rush for the open with a yell. The widow herself catches some of the surplus in her hair, and also makes for the pump. She had hardly recovered from this adventure before she was noosed in a clothesline, pulled up at right angles, just as she was being courted by Schmidt. The policeman came in to lend a hand, and there was the usual mix-up between Germany and Ireland. Mother Murphy, however, observed Red Read and her friends at the other end of the rope, managed to get her hands upon her daughter, and thus reversing the position, laid violent hands upon her person.

THE SALVATION OF NANCE O'SHAUGHNESSY (Special— 2 parts—March 30).—Left an orphan as she is just emerging from her teens, Nance O'Shaughnessy finds herself quite unprotected in the slums of Greater New York. She goes to work to earn an honest living, but soon attracts the attention of one of those human hawks that ever hover over innocence, in the person of Pat McGuire, a smug spieler of a cheap dancing academy. The so-called "dancing academy" is probably one of the worst vice-breathers masquerading under the form of amusement, that has ever been created. The girls in the laundry where Nance works frequent McGuire's, with their "steadies," and induce the new girl to join them.

Nance does not care for the man himself, but she is crazy over the dancing and the only liberty that comes into her circumscribed life seems to be in the waltz when McGuire places his arms about her and swings her cleverly about the floor to the rhythmic move of the music. Presently drinks begin to follow the dance and lead poor Nance up to the brink where darkness lurks in the depths.

The second reel shows a new masculine influence coming into Nance's life that is the wholesome antithesis to the sodden spieler. Sandy McCarthy is a husky, honest, fresh-blooded lad from the country, who comes to the city on Sundays and, occasionally drops into the dance hall to pass away the loneliness of evenings. There he meets Nance, and the Celtic instincts of the two draw the pair together—but the moment the spieler comes around, his spell seems to reassert itself over the girl. Sandy sees the danger and induces the girl to visit the neighboring country on Sundays and shows her some of the beauties outside of the murky depths of the canyoned streets of the big, noisy, feverish city.

A contrasting feature of this triangle, is brought about by Mame Ryan, whose only solace in life is her brave little boy Dicky, as she lives in a wretched tenement with a sodden sort of a husband. Mame, having no affection or joy at home, naturally seeks it in other places, and is enamored of the spieler McGuire. That unworthy, however, quickly wearies of her attentions, and after giving her a few drinks, when she calls, casts her aside. Mame has become what is technically known as a "souse." She has a bottle constantly at home to which she returns when her boy cannot steal it and put it away. Even with his childish bands clinging to her, she races off to the dance hall. Then, if she is away from home after a certain hour, little Dicky runs up to the dance hall to pull her back without letting Ryan know where he has gone. The poor boy knows that his mother's absence is a sign that she is too tipsy to come home promptly.

One night, Mame desperate in drink and green-eyed with despair throws her arms about McGuire when he is crossing the floor with Nance, and begs him to come back to her. He fells her with a brutal blow. Dicky appears at this moment for his mother, and he gets a slap that sends him down. This opens Nance's eyes, and she at last sees the brutal McGuire in his true light. Sandy strides into the crowd and when Mame has been helped to her feet, McGuire steps forward menacingly. Incidentally Sandy hands him a left on the jaw which sends him down for the count as the parties leave the dance hall. Sandy takes Nance out to the park overlooking the harbor where the night wind blows cool from over the Bay, that she may recover herself.

Poor Mame demoralized, breaks away from Dicky in the street, and runs down the wharf to end her miserable life in the welcome waters of the harbor. Sandy and Nance see her and drag her back from the brink. At this moment little Dicky runs into the scene, and the light that has come into the younger lives seems to touch the sodden soul of the elder woman, and mother-love promises to regenerate. The last scene is the reconciliation with her rough, old husband, who promises to treat her better, which peace compact is accomplished through the young lovers, Nance and Sandy, who have seen the better way themselves.

THE SECRET VAULT (Cines—2 parts—April 14).—It was a case of love at first sight when Claudia Melville, daughter of a wealthy banker, met young John Martin, the newly elected prosecuting attorney, then engaged in preparing his case against a corrupt "ring" of politicians who had held the affairs of the municipality in their thumbs for years.

Francis Duval, Melville's private secretary, is madly in love with his employer's daughter, and learning of his rival's rapid progress in her affections, swears revenge. Fate soon offers him an excellent opportunity to carry out his plans.

Called by important business to a neighboring city, Martin confides an envelope containing documentary evidence against the "ring," to his prospective father-in-law for safekeeping during his absence. Before his return the banker suddenly dies and Duval conspires with Martin's political enemies to steal the incriminating papers. In the dead of night they open the banker's safe and make away with the precious envelope.

Confronted with the failure of his case on account of the disappearance of the documents, Martin is desperate. He enlists the services of Fox, a celebrated detective, and together they set out to recover the stolen evidence at any cost. A clue leads them to the haunts of Duval and his associates and after a long running fight, culminating in a plunge over a towering cliff, they succeed in regaining possession of the much sought envelope. Upon opening it, however, they are astounded to find that it contains nothing but some old newspapers. The dead banker, fearing just such an attempt upon the part of Martin's political rivals, had made the substitution in order to protect the papers. How to discover the hiding place of the real documents is the puzzle that now confronts the young attorney.

With the aid of the astute Fox, Martin institutes a search which is finally rewarded by the discovery of a secret vault, and there the priceless papers are found, just in time for the hearing of the case. Thinking themselves secure, the prosecutor's have not thought it worth while even to bolster up their defense, and the day of the trial finds them almost totally unprepared. A sweeping victory for the prosecutor is the result, and triumph of Martin's case against the grafters makes him a commanding political figure overnight. And it is needless to say that when Claudia Melville throws herself into his outstretched arms his happiness is complete.

A MILLION BID (Five parts).—The story concerns a mercenary and managing mother and her daughter, Agnes. The young lady loves a youthful doctor, but a match is frustrated by the mother, who seeks to marry the daughter to the highest bidder. The mother's extravagance ruins the father, who, being in ill health, succumbs to heart failure.

With poverty staring them in the face, the mother takes Agnes abroad, finally forcing her into a marriage with an Australian millionaire. To do so, the mother intercepts all letters between Agnes and the young doctor, with the result that each feels that the other has ceased to care.

The millionaire and his young wife, while on their honeymoon on his yacht, are shipwrecked. He is dealt a terrible blow on the head, and it completely destroys his memory. The young wife is saved and returns to America, while her husband is picked up by a French fisherman. His memory gone, he does not recall his previous existence.

In America, Agnes and the doctor renew their love affair and finally marry, excellent proof having been furnished that her former husband had drowned in the shipwreck. There is no opposition to the marriage now, as the mother also had perished in the catastrophe.

Five years later, the young doctor has become a famous brain specialist. To him, Agnes' former husband comes for an operation in the hope of restoring his lost memory. The two men, never having met, fail to learn they are both married to the same woman. She discovers it, however, and with her happiness at stake, does not tell her surgeon-husband the truth, but attempts to dissuade him from operating on her first husband, fearful that the operation will prove successful and her first husband regain his lost memory and recognize her as his wife.

The humanity in the surgeon surmounts his wife's pleas, but the patient fails to withstand the operation and Agnes' happiness is assured, despite the terrible situations which confronted her.

She presses the button and Charlie, her husband, immediately leaves his surprised companions and runs all the way home. The next day Vivian tells her friend, Mrs. Gazelle, about the attractor and she borrows it to try it on her husband. He happens to be getting a shave when she touches the button. His face half shaved he returns home. Vivian sends her husband for the attractor. He goes, not knowing what it is, and gets it. He takes it to his office. He accidently touches the button. Percy, however, loses his nerve and decides that drowning is easier. When he arrives at the river he accidently falls in. When Geraldine's father gets her letter he goes to Percy's room. He is informed that Percy has gone down the river. He arrives there just in time to see Percy being brought out. His heart melts and he gives his consent to the marriage.

UNIVERSAL IKE MAKES A MONKEY OF HIMSELF (April 14).—The Moody Opera Company arrives in the village and finds that the town hall has been rented to a farmer for storing hay. Every member of the company broke. Universal Ike, the cook at a nearby ranch, invites the actors to be his guests. Ike has his eye set for Louise, the leading lady. The damsel, however, already has a sweetheart in the monkey she carries around with her. Ike becomes jealous of the monkey and plans to turn a trick which will defeat his hairy rival. Among the actors effects is a monkey skin. While the members of the troupe are being entertained at a rodeo, Ike spirits the monkey away from Louise and locks it up. He then disguises himself as a monkey and goes to Louise. Monkey-like, he rubs against her foot. Woman-like, she thinks this exceedingly cute of her pet and even kisses him. But this state of bliss does not continue for Ike. Ike feels the craving for a smoke come over him. He combats it and loses. He takes a smoke. Louise screams and swoons. Ike flees and takes refuge in the middle of a mill pond. When the shadows begin to fall and the scent of freshly-cooked coffee fills the air, Ike is still in the middle of the pond. That is a very safe place for him.

ECLAIR.

THE HEART'S HIGHWAY (2 parts—April 15).—Professor Suger has three children whom he adores—two daughters and a son. The son goes to Paris to study. To increase his small allowance he plays a piano at night in a cabaret. Meanwhile, Blanche, the youngest daughter, meets with an accident. A young man, Jean de Nangis, visiting in that country, gives her aid, and then takes her home to her father. Then they part, Jean is in love. They soon exchange the first avowals of love. Blanche yields to the solicitations of Jean, and follows him to Paris, where they are secretly married.

Marie, the eldest daughter, feels grieved and resolves to depart for Paris, where, with the aid of the brother, she will find Blanche. While in the cabaret, Pierre Suger repulses the advances of a beautiful woman. On going out he is attacked, but is protected by the intervention of a gentleman. Once home, Pierre Suger relates the event to her sister, and they both decide to go and thank the generous saviour. They are greatly surprised when they find that he is Jean de Nangis, and living with their sister, in happiness.

Pierre Suger manifests his astonishment. Jean de Nangis tells Pierre that he married his sister secretly and is endeavoring to have his mother consent to accept Blanche as her daughter-in-law. They decide they should take Blanche home while awaiting the consent. Jean leaves to ask his mother, the Countess of Nangis. She absolutely refuses, saying she does not want a misalliance in her family. It is with a broken heart that Jean writes the outcome to the father of Blanche.

Mr. Suger rages before the outrage hurled at him; he—a man of exemplary honesty. He forbids his daughter to think of Jean. But, the young man loves Blanche, and in a short time his violent pain causes brain-fever to develop. He writes to Blanche to come and visit him. Her love proves stronger and she leaves to go and nurse Jean. The Countess of Nangis tries to hinder her son from seeing Blanche. He resists, and the mother cedes her place to the young girl. Meanwhile, Mr. Suger, fearing that his distracted daughter will attempt her life, rushes to Paris. He feels himself weakening before so much love. A reconciliation is had all around.

THE PRICE (April 19).—When Governor Beacroft lies at the point of death the doctors tell his daughter that the only hope is a blood transfusion. The daughter offers herself. The doctors refuse on account of the nervous condition she is in. She tells her fiance that state of affairs, but he pleads a weak heart. During this time, a burglar is stealthily trying one of the rear windows. He is surprised by the police and takes refuge under the lattice work of the porch. After a fruitless search the police leave. The burglar, emerging from his hiding place, opens a window and walks directly into the governer's daughter. At first she is terrified and then regaining her composure, moves toward the table to ring for one of the servants. The intruder pleads with her not to summon help, telling her that he has not done anything and that he will give her his life if she will but let him go. She hesitates and then struck by the worn and destitute appearance of the house breaker, accedes to his request. Meanwhile the police have struck the trail and have entered the house. She pushes the burglar into the sick room and when the detectives enter, tells them that he is to be used in a blood transfusion to save the governor's life. The operation is performed. After the transfusion the intruder is placed in bed and when the doctor leaves him for a minute, he arises and secures a picture of the girl. Meanwhile, the girl's fiance has called. The girl asks the doctor to examine him. The specialist tells her that her sweetheart is a perfect specimen of health. Hurt at his lack of courage, she bids him go. She asks the thief what his reward will be. He slowly shakes his head and asks nothing but to depart unmolested. He leaves the house with the picture tightly clasped under his coat, while the girl stands watching him from the window until he disappears from sight.

NOTORIETY (April 13).—King, a broken-down actor who had formerly been a great star, conceives the idea of getting back into the limelight again by pretending to be the instigator of a terrible murder that is baffling the detectives of the entire country. He leaves with a friend the proofs of his innocence, but at the crucial moment, when only these proofs will save him, his friend discovers that he has inadvertantly destroyed them. King goes to the chair and as the electric current is turned on - wakes up in his little shabby hall bedroom, to find it has all been a horrible dream.

THE SEA COAST OF BOHEMIA (2 parts—April 16).—Jack is a shiftless young artist with little apparent talent. He lives with Jim, a dissipated old painter. Jack receives a letter from a dealer, discouraging his work. Disgusted with all, he turns to the country for something better. Wandering through that rural district he stops at a farmhouse for a meal and while there he paints the picture of the daughter of the house.

Miriam is a wealthy girl, the ward of an unscrupulous guardian, who wishes her to marry his worthless son. She hates them both. In the woods one day she meets the artist painting the farm-girl's portrait. Impressed by his good looks she does not forget him. Later a messenger brings the guardian news that a new codicil to the will has been discovered and unless the ward marries before she is twenty-one, the inheritance is to go to the guardian.

Miriam overhears this. It is a question of hours until she will be of age. She escapes from a room in which she has been locked. They pursue. She gets in an auto. This breaks down running through the fields. She meets the artist and implores him to marry her immediately, promising a big reward. Though bewildered, he agrees. The pursuers overtake the couple as they emerge from the church. Leaving the artist, Miriam gives him a purse. He throws it from him. Then she sees the artist apparently making love to the farmer's daughter and this arouses her jealousy.

The artist returns to the city and takes up his work with renewed vigor. Without letting her name be known, Miriam buys his pictures. The artist wishes for a perfect model. Unable to find one, he thinks of his wife. With her image in his mind, he paints a picture that takes a prize. Miriam, thinking that he has painted someone else, vows to destroy it. But on seeing it, she is repentant and her love increases for the young artist—her husband.

Meantime, the guardian, in revenge, destroys the picture. Miriam is blamed by those who overheard her threat. The artist and his wife meet and he graciously takes the blame on himself, but a crippled boy has seen the act and he points out the guilty party.

THE TEST (April 15).—The story is of the two husbands—one rich—the other poor—both confronting matrimonial disaster. The rich man is about to lose his wife because she is unworthy. He comes to hate all humanity and contemplates suicide. The other husband is about to lose his wife through poverty and illness. He contemplates robbery.

The poor man is driven to the last ditch. He leaves his hovel with the intention of committing robbery. He breaks his way into the house of the rich man. The owner has a revolver in one hand and a vial of poison in the other. He is debating which road he shall take into the grave. The rich man hears a burglar. He turns the revolver upon the intruder. The poor man then tells his story. The rich man thinks it a lie invented for the occasion. To test the truth of the burglar's statement, he hands him the poison with the words: "This drug will not prove fatal for an hour. Prove your love for your wife and children by taking this and I'll give you $1,000."

The rich man pretends to pour the poison in the glass, but instead turns it upon the table. The poor man drinks what he thinks is the poison. The rich man is touched by the other's nobility. He keeps his promise to the poor man and begins life anew.

WHEN THE GIRLS JOIN THE FORCE (2 parts—April 17).—At the police station events are moving rapidly. A complete police force of pretty, silk-stockinged girls has been sworn in. Their first thought is to renovate the prison. All doors are thrown open. Turkish rugs are spread over the floors. A symphony orchestra is engaged to entertain the prisoners. Refresbments are served to the condemned. Receptions for the prisoners and tango teas are the order of the day.

An old rounder is arrested, but when he discovers the delightful condition he pleads guilty to every crime of which he can think. His wife arrives and causes his release. News of the new condition spreads like wildfire. Lee tells Eddie, newly married. Eddie eludes his young wife and overturns a fruit vender's stand for the sole purpose of getting arrested. He also partakes of the delights of jail life, until his wife drags him back home.

Lee and Eddie are invited to raise a riot by the old-chief and his court of grafters. But in the hands of the pretty policewomen the rioters are as docile as lambs.

This heyday, however, does not last. The administration gets "wise" to the carryings-on. A radical change is instituted. The girls are discharged and in their places is installed a force composed of homely old maids disappointed in love.

Husbands return to the bosom of their families Lee and Eddie would now alas! enjoy their freedom, but they are doomed to serve their term with the rest of the grafters.

REX.

A BOOB INCOGNITO (April 16).—The daughter of a wealthy broker aspires to marry a titled man—just a title. Deep in her heart, however, she loves Allen, but rejects his proposal, with the hope of ultimately hooking a nobleman. At about this time a good-hearted country boob arrives in the city with his family and is given the position of janitor in the broker's office. To bring his daughter to her senses the broker hires the boob to impersonate a titled personage. Forthwith the boob is turned over to a masseur. The broker presents him to his daughter as the Earl of Dostifink. After a half hour's association with the boob, the daughter is forever cured of her hankering for nobility and the important question before her is. "How shall I get rid of him?" However, this riddle is solved by Allen, her true love. He brings the boob's wife and children to the broker's house. The wife no sooner sees the boob than she takes him by the ear, exposes him to the girl and leads him home. The broker's daughter cannot wait to accept the proposal of Allen, having concluded that just a plain American citizen is good enough for her.

THE LAST SUPPER (2 parts—April 13).—Christ is shown as the hidden power that influences mankind to turn from iniquity to righteousness. The carnal mind, prompted by selfish and negative desires, experiences the operation of an inner consciousness, which thwarts evil passions and promotes good and noble aspirations.

The drunkard is turned from his life of dissipation to one of honest effort. The sloven are awakened to a realization of their utter hopelessness. Everywhere the presence of a divine power is perceptible. The evil in a drunkard's home is banished by the thought of Christ, who appears as the man of Nazareth. The tempter at the threshold of the idle rich is thwarted and the Christ Man, by his presence, drives home conviction of guilt as the woman scorns her lover to remain true to the absent husband. Innocence is not permitted to be victimized by the lust of the flesh as the quiet little voice of conscience, aroused by the proximity of the man of sorrows, averts a tragedy.

The "Thirteen Club," a social organization devoting its energies to the promulgation of higher ideals, is unwittingly the guest of a stranger, who turns out to be Christ. As they gather at the banquet table to discuss their experiences they dissolve into Christ and the Apostles at the Last Supper, after a renowned painting by the celebrated Leonardo di Vinci. The picture concludes with the gathering at the Sea of Galilee, where Christ is seen walking on the water.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF SUSAN (April 15).—Susan is the boss of her own homestead ranch, and resents the advice of her neighbor, John, although he knows all about the laws governing homestead property, and also the laws of nature that govern crops and ranches in general. Besides this he has a deep love for Susan, which she refuses to see until a handsome stranger comes along and gets her interest thoroughly aroused. She flirts madly with him at the dance, but when she discovers the next day that he is jumping her land she turns to her old friend for protection and he saves her land and wins her stubborn heart.

THANHOUSER.

TIN SOLDIER AND THE DOLL (April 5).—The little girl had many toys in her nursery, but she was particularly fond of Grace, her doll, and a noble tin soldier. Just about this time her uncle presented her with a new doll, and perhaps her joy over the present was what caused her to dream a wonderful dream that night. She imagined that both dolls and the tin soldier came to life, but the new doll fascinated the tin soldier and they were married. The old doll, whom the child had once loved, proved herself to be an envious, heartless creature, for she lured away the young Benedict from his wife, and the poor deserted woman committed suicide by jumping over a cliff.

The girl was peering over the edge of the cliff when she awoke to find herself peering over the edge of the bed, while on the floor lay the new doll which she had dropped, and which has been smashed to bits by the fall. It was a sad blow to her, but womanlike she blamed the man in the case, then the tin soldier's life was extremely unhappy. In time the child forgot the romance that had come to her in her dreams.

A DEBUT IN THE SECRET SERVICE (April 7).—Lord Trevor and Nan Tremain, his ward, were prominent figures in London society, and were really among the most prominent of the diplomatic agents of the government. Usually Trevor did most of the work, but in one particular instance Nan proved her ability to handle a problem single-handed, and from that time on ranked equally with Trevor, the famous "Diplomatic Free Lance."

On the street back of Trevor's home was a house supposedly occupied by a wealthy East Indian, Abdul, who was in reality Trevor's body servant. The two houses were connected by a tunnel, through which visitors to Trevor could secretly make their way without being spied upon from the outside.

On one occasion a well dressed woman was injured in an accident outside of Abdul's home and was carried into his house to be attended to. While she raved in delirium, Abdul learned enough to satisfy him that she was a spy under orders to assist Col. Pfaff, the Kaiser's chief representative in London. She spoke constantly of her ring, stating it would identify her. Abdul reported to Trevor, who was in consultation with Sir Edward Wray, and Nan boldly told them that she thought she could solve the problem better than they could. The men laughed at her, but a little later when she came in through the secret passage dressed as a foreign noblewoman they were compelled to admit that probably she was right in her claims. Nan made good and after a series of exciting adventures recovered the plans of certain coast fortifications which had fallen into the hands of Col. Pfaff, and would have been of irredeemable loss to her country had they reached another country. Both Trevor and Wray frankly admitted that they had made a mistake and honestly assured Nan that her debut in the secret service was a triumphant success.

MAJESTIC.

TEXAS BILL'S LAST RIDE (April 5).—May March, the daughter of a rancher, is in love with Bob Boyd, the son of a neighboring farmer. May's father disapproves of her choice and orders Bob to cease his attentions to her. That day Bob's old father is held up by a bandit, for whose capture a big reward has been offered. After the holdup the old man gives the alarm at the ranch, and March and all the ranch hands start out in pursuit of the bandit, leaving May alone in the house. She is lonesome and frightened and as she knows where Bob is working, she sends a boy with a note stating that she is alone and afraid and wants him. Bob is more than willing to act as her protector and starts immediately for her house. The bandit manages to elude his pursuers by doubling on his tracts. He passes the ranch house, sees it is deserted, forces his way in, then makes May disclose the whereabouts of the valuables. Having secured the plunder, he attempts to embrace May, but she struggles and screams. Bob arrives at the right moment and rushes to May's rescue. But Bob is no match for the bandit, who soon has him and the girl at his mercy. Old Boyd, missing his son from his usual haunts, goes to the ranch in search of him, and, remembering his experience of the morning, does not go unarmed. The posse come in time to rescue Bob and the girl from the clutches of the bandit. Mr. March awards Bob for his bravery by ceasing to oppose the lovers.

One day Rosie sends out invitations for a big party. The night of the party Walter starts downtown, stopping often on the way to show off his clothes. He shadows Sam home, peeks over the transom and sees Sam putting on one of them city dress suits, Sam leaving the coat and vest on a chair, goes into the next room. Walter gets a can of giant powder, comes back, steals into Sam's room and fills his coat and vest full of the powder, putting it in all the pockets and sprinkling it between the cloth and the lining. But he has a witness in the servant girl, who is peeking in a window.

At the party Sam is the favored suitor. While Sam and Rosie are busy chatting together the servant girl slips into the party, thrusts a note into Sam's hand and disappears. Sam opens it and reads: "Don't move, don't laugh, don't bump into anybody; your clothes are full of dynamite.—A friend." The horrible truth steals over Sam. He gingerly starts for the door when Rosie sees him going and playfully jerks him back into the house. The playful jerk nearly gives Sam heart failure. He and Rosie carefully sit down in a corner. Every now and then Rosie gives him a playful tap with her fan. Sam nearly faints every time. Walter looks on the scene gloating. Sam sees that there is bound to be an explosion, so it may as well be

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Chapter XII—April 6).—Margaret, "Our Mutual Girl," never enjoyed a day quite so much nor saw so many interesting sights in the metropolis. Before she left the house the footman brought to her a present from an admirer, a handsome pedigreed Boston bull terrier.

Then "Our Mutual Girl" and her aunt started out in the big limousine for a trip around the city. They saw Grant's Tomb and admired the big white marble mausoleum. Going along Riverside Drive they saw the famous Soldiers and Sailors monument. Driving downtown, the party passed the Tombs, the New York city prison, and the Bridge of Sighs, as the covered bridge leading from the upper story to the Criminal Court building is called. Way downtown, where Wall street joins Broadway, they saw the famous old Trinity Church, dwarfed by the sky scrapers which surround the most notable landmark remaining of New York as it was fifty years ago. They got a good impression of the church as it looks on week days with the busy business crowd passing, and as it looks on Sundays, with the worshippers coming out.

From there "Our Mutual Girl" visited the Imperator, the largest passenger steamship in the world, and bade a friend "good-bye." After a short trip home "Our Mutual Girl" again started out, this time to the Grand Central Palace, where the Sportsmen's Show was being held. On the roof she saw the champion woman trap shooters of the world, among them Mrs. Vogel and Mrs. Thorpe shooting clay pigeons.

Going home "Our Mutual Girl" met a very real celebrity, Commander Evans, of the British Navy, the hero of the ill-fated Captain Scott South Polar Expedition. Commander Evans presented "Our Mutual Girl" with his autographed photograph. After he left, Margaret called for her new pet, the dog, and taking him with her, dropped off to sleep, a tired out happy girl.

CAPTAIN JUNIOR (2 parts—April 15).—Billy, known in fort as "Captain Junior," is informed by his father that he is soon to have a new mother. This Billy resents, thinking it rather disparaging to his own mother. After a pathetic scene between father and son, Billy visits his mother's grave and is found there weeping by Sergeant Casey, whom the father, Captain Allen, has sent out to look for him. When Allen leaves for the frontier station with an escort to meet his bride, Billy secrets himself in the coach, but is very sullen to the new mother, Alice.

Allen receives a telegram from the fort, commanding him to investigate an Indian uprising. He send Alice and Billy with the escort back to the fort while he, with the remainder of the command, rides to the scene of the uprising, only to find that the Indians have ravaged the town and departed. In the meantime the Indians attack the fort and while the soldiers are fighting, Billy manfully takes Alice to the top of the hill, where they are unnoticed by the Indians. Alice faints from exhaustion. When Allen returns to the fort he finds them all nearly distracted because they cannot find Billy. Allen is equally surprised to learn that he and Alice have not reached the fort. A command is sent out and Billy, loyally taking care of Alice, is discovered, and a touching reunion takes place.

THE GEISHA (2 parts—April 10).—Ordered to foreign waters, Ensign Carver bids his fiancee goodbye and sails for Japan. Carver, his chum, Blake, and two or three other officers, take shore leave at Nagasaki, sight seeking. They visit a Japanese garden and meet Myo, a beautiful Geisha girl. Carver falls in love with the girl. So infatuated is he that he refuses to return to his ship. Blake, in order to save Carver from himself, attempts to arrest him, but Carver makes his escape. Blake, to save Carver from disgrace in the service, tells the captain that Carver has fallen and broken his thigh and will be compelled to remain in the hospital for some time. Carver marries Myo and remains in Japan and writes to Cecelia, breaking the engagement.

Two years later Senator Ridgway, father of Cecelia, is ordered to Japan on diplomatic service. They meet Carver in the Japanese Tea Garden. He is now a derelict, spending most of his time drinking. Carver learns that Senator Ridgway is desirous of procuring certain papers from the Japanese government and in order to regain his lost favor in Cecelia's eyes attempts to steal the papers from Baron Yoshido. He is watched by Takura, the deposed lover of Myo, and followed to Senator Ridgway's apartments, where Carver commits suicide sooner than be captured by the Japanese soldiers. The picture closes with Myo sobbing at her shrine in the garden.

DOMINO.

THE COLONEL'S ORDERLY (2 parts—April 9).—Grace Forsythe, the Colonel's daughter, discourages the attentions of Lieutenant Burton, and falls in love with her father's orderly, Private Berger, who is known at the Post as "The Man of Mystery." Burton steals some money from Colonel Forsythe, but suspicion points to Private Berger and the Colonel places him under arrest.

In the meanwhile the Colonel's younger daughter, Mildred, and her governess, en route to the post, are attacked by Indians. The governess is killed and Mildred taken captive. Berger, rather than suffer a term in a military prison for a crime that he did not commit, escapes, and, discovering Mildred as captive, rescues her. Lieutenant Burton, fatally injured in the fight with the Indians, confesses to the robbery, and the mystery around Private Berger is solved. He is restored to his previous rank and the charge of assaulting a superior officer is stricken from his record.

FIGHTING DEATH (4 parts—April 10).—Clara, a pretty little school teacher, is courted by two young mountaineers. She favors Jim Mason, who is the postmaster of the village, and Harry Barford, his rival, determines to get Jim out of the way, so that he can win her. Jim and Clara decide to marry as soon as Jim has enough money. Harry sees his chance and offers Jim $500.00 to manage an illicit whiskey still during his absence. Clara's scruples are overcome by the thought of an early marriage and Jim reluctantly consents. Harry immediately informs the sheriff and a posse is sent to arrest Jim. But Billy, the village idiot, who has fallen asleep while playing his little tin flute, overhears the conversation between Harry and the sheriff and informs Clara of Jim's danger. Jim hides in the woods upon the approach of the posse and, meeting Clara, they flee, both riding on the same horse. A long chase through the snow-covered mountains in which they are closely pressed by the sheriff's posse, forces them to a spot among the jagged cliffs, where their only means of escaping their pursuers is a fifty-eight foot plunge into a raging torrent full of broken ice. They urge their horse over the edge of the cliff and plunge to the depths below miraculously escaping with their lives and safely reaching the shore.

They take refuge in an Indian village and the chief, a giant Indian over seven feet tall, appoints himself a committee of one to compel the little fat parson to marry them. Clara returns to the village and Jim goes to New York to prepare a home for her. Barford is appointed postmaster and succeeds in intercepting Jim's mail, meanwhile forcing his attentions upon Jim's wife.

Not hearing from Clara, Jim decides to take a desperate chance and return to the village by a dangerous route, which will enable him to elude the guardians of the law. In order to do this he is forced to walk hand over hand across a cable 250 feet long, placed by a lumber company over a deep ravine.

Arriving at Clara's house he finds her in the arms of Barford, not knowing he has forcibly placed his arms around her. Jim leaves broken-hearted and is seen by Barford, who follows him at a distance. As Jim is recrossing the 250 feet of cable, Barford shoots him in the arm, in spite of which he succeeds in escaping and returns to New York. A baby is born to Clara, and she determines to find Jim at all costs and tell him that he is a proud father. She goes to New York, and being in need of money, accepts the offer of a motion picture company to jump from the Brooklyn Bridge for $10,000. Jim, who is desperate and out of work, accepts the offer of the same company to also make the leap, and is horror-struck by recognizing his wife, just as she throws herself from the giant structure into the icy waters below. He leaps after her and succeeds in aiding her to reach a tug-boat, where she rests happily in her lost husband's arms.

They make a new attempt to get possession of their baby, but are caught in their cabin by Barford and the posse, where a fierce fight is interrupted by a misdirected blow, which fells the poor village fool, Billy. He is revived and it is discovered that the blow has restored his sanity. He tells of Barford's villainy and produces evidence that brands him as the real criminal and leaves Jim and Clara free to enjoy each others love.

THE CLAWS OF GREED (Three parts).—Julien Delmore, while studying music abroad, meets Lucetta, a music hall singer, and, believing that his love is returned, marries her. The act does not surprise his friends, among whom he is known as "Mad Delmore," because of his many impulsive acts. His mother, a wealthy and aristocratic widow, however, to whom he has brought home his bride, is despleased and receives Lucetta coldly. Lucetta, in reality an adventuress, manages to introduce Carlos, a fugitive from Europe and the chief of the Black Nine Gang, as her brother, a Count. Julien, again acting under impulse, adopts Leila, a little street musician, Jacopo and Madalena, her supposed uncle and aunt, reluctantly consent for a sum of money. The plans of Lucetta and Carlos are discovered, largely due to Leila, and Julien disillusioned, orders Lucetta from his house.

Julien, his mother and Leila go abroad. Leila grows to womanhood and becomes famous in the musical and social world. Besieged by suitors, she loves Julien only. Realizing the hopelessness of their love, Julien still being the husband of Lucetta, she obeys the dictates of conscience and determines to leave home secretly. On the eve of her departure she receives a note from Madalena, bidding her come to her before she dies. Upon entering Jacopo's house, Deila finds herself a prisoner. Jacopo has read in a newspaper that the Marquis di Rubini, whose daughter was stolen by a steward of her household years before, has obtained clews leading to America and offers a reward for information. Jacopo is in fact the stewart and Leila the kidnapped child.

Meanwhile, the Black Nine, disbanded for a time, have assumed activities. Battisti, the hunchback artisan and bomb maker, mocked for his deformity and the butt of the gang's practical jokes, burns to punish his tormentors. Carlos long cherishing his anger against Julien, lures him to the gang's headquarters. Leila, imprisoned, sees Julien's capture. By Carlo's order, Julien is flung through a trap door into a rushing sluiceway. Battista betrays the gang to the police, but returns to the gang to avoid suspicion. One of the gang reports Battista's treachery. Battista denounced by the gang threatens them with a bomb. Carlos draws a revolver. Battista throws the bomb and wrecks the house. Carlos and Lucetta are killed and Jacopo fatally injured. Leila escapes and helps the police to find and rescue Julien. Jacopo confesses and sends a note to the Marquise, which brings about the reunion of mother and daughter. The future happiness of Julien and Leila is assured.

AMBROSIO.

THE MYSTERY OF THE GLASS CAGE (2 parts).—Mr. and Mrs. Robert Morris are visited by their friend Mrs. Dalbret. They arrange to go for a short excursion on a sailing yacht. Among other passengers on board is Baron Daere, who is auxious to make the acquaintance of Mr. Morris and his party and being utterly unscrupulous as to his methods he has one of his henchmen push Mrs. Morris overboard as if by accident. The Baron then plunges in to her rescue. Of course Mr. Morris is very grateful to his wife's rescuer. They exchange cards and the Baron is formally presented to the two ladies. In the meantime we see the Baron's valet reading a newspaper account of "another mysterious death" of a rich clubman, who after winning heavily at the Casino, a fashionable gambling club, is found dead and the police attribute it to suicide. The valet chuckles over their stupidity, for he well knows the secret of their death.

A few days later, Mr. and Mrs. Morris with their guest decide to attend a masque ball at the Casino and the Baron lays his plans accordingly. He induces Morris to try his luck at 'rouge-et-noir' and he wins a large amount. The Baron has two women accomplices who are to be introduced to Morris and to make up a supper party at the Baron's house. By accident, however, Mrs. Morris and Mrs. Dalbret being masked and dressed very much like the other two ladies, are mistaken for them by the Baron, and when he tells them mysteriously to come with him and "follow instructions" they think it is some practical joke and fall in with his plans. They all go to the Baron's house and the Baron gets Morris alone in a room and while he is seated talking, suspecting nothing, the Baron touches an electric button and a large glass cage descends and imprisons him.

He thinks it a joke and laughs heartily, but as he notes the change in the Baron's expression, a vague fear seizes him, for the smile of friendship has given place to a crafty, cruel, leer, of triumph. The Baron then explains that the cage can be filled with a deadly gas and to emphasize his statement he slowly turns it on. As the poisonous fumes begin to affect his victim, the Baron opens a small window in the cage and tells Morris he can save his life by giving up all the cash he has with him and also signing a check for $15,000. Morris indignantly refuses, but as the gas is turned on stronger he realizes that he is in the power of a merciless demon and hands over his money and signs the check. After securing the money, however, the fiendish assassin sets his infernal mechanism to pour in a still greater volume of gas, so as to insure the death of Morris.

In the meantime the two ladies becoming tired of waiting in another part of the house, come into the room and discover Morris in the cage. They are unable to release him and seek a means of escape to go for help. As the outer doors are locked, Mrs. Morris lifts Mrs. Dalbret through an attic window, where she makes her way over the roof and along a narrow cornice to the adjoining house and is assisted to the street. Mrs. Morris after Mrs. Dalbret escapes, secures a heavy knife and succeeds in cutting the pipe which carries the gas into the cage, but is herself overcome by the fumes. The Baron after counting and gloating over his ill-gotten gains discovers Mrs. Morris unconscious and carries her upstairs to the "death room," where he finds to his astonishment that Morris is reviving and the gas is no longer flowing. While he is examining the apparatus the door is broken in by the officers led by Mrs. Dalbret and the scoundrel is arrested. Morris is released from the cage and falls into the embrace of his faithful wife and her brave friend who have rescued him from a terrible death.

ECLECTIC.

LOYALTY (Five parts—April 10).—In the village of Weepsy, near the great city of Amsterdam, lived little Gretchen Krug with her parents, who owned a tulip farm. Her only playmate was Hans Schmidt, a shepherd boy. Learning of an approaching flower festival in a nearby town, the two children decided to decorate their dog-cart and enter the contest for a prize. Great was their surprise and delight to be awarded the first prize. Then came the folk-dances, in which all the children took part. None among them was more graceful than Gretchen and Hans, who were partners. Their charm and grace did not escape the attention of Herr Zimmer, the director of a theater in Amsterdam. He complimented the two children and gave Gretchen his card, telling her to call on him if she should decide to go on the stage.

The next day, during a severe storm, Gretchen's father was struck by lighting and killed. Deprived of his support, her mother decided to take advantage of the director's offer and sent Gretchen to Amsterdam. The two children were broken-hearted to be thus separated and at the first opportunity Hans followed his little sweetheart to the big city. But the stern hand of his mother interfered with his romance and he was compelled to return home.

Six years rolled on and Gretchen had become a celebrated dancer. In her new life she had traveled afar and forgotten all about the little village. Hans, however, never forgot the sweet days of old and often sighed for his little playmate. Hearing that she had returned to Amsterdam after a long and successful tour, he decided to call and see her. But she cared not to resume her friendship with the rustic shepherd and refused to receive him.

She had become enthusiastic about ballooning and often expressed a desire to make an ascension. One day an opportunity came and amid the plaudits of her friends she rose into the air. She was accompanied by a young man, to whom she was engaged to be married. When they were at a great height, their balloon was suddenly caught in a terrific storm. Absolutely helpless, they were buffeted and swirled by the awful wind and rain. With a terrifying flash, a bolt of lightning struck the huge gas-bag and with a report like the crack of doom, the balloon burst into flame and shot like a meteor toward the earth. Gretchen and her fiance were found unconscious by the villagers and removed to a hospital. For many days their lives were despaired of, but they finally recovered. Gretchen, however, was doomed to perpetual darkness, as her eyesight was totally destroyed. No longer then did her lover come to her, and she found herself abandoned by all her admirers. But her fond old mother came for her and took her back to the old home. When Hans learned that Gretchen was home again, he called to see her and was horrified to hear of her great misfortune. Loyal to the last, his great love and sympathy conquered everything. Taking her in his arms he vowed that he would never leave her again. And Gretchen realized then the true love and loyalty of her shepherd sweetheart.

WARNER'S FEATURES, INC.

WHEN MEN WOULD KILL (Three parts).—Briefly told, the story concerns the long standing warfare between the Charltons and the Redferns. Grace Charlton, a general favorite with everybody, is sent to New York to study voice culture under the leading teachers of the metropolis. During her rise to fame, and her subsequent successful appearance in grand opera, Grace never forgets the lion-hearted Jim Redfern, who has completely won her by his primitive wooing. Much as she loves Jim, she does not hesitate to take sides with her family against him when the feud breaks out anew.

Grace receives a telegram that her father has been wounded, and hastens to her humble Southern home to direct the fight for revenge waged by her brothers against the Redferns. Later, Grace receives a bullet in her shoulder that was intended for her father. The next night, the Charlton's home takes fire, and they are rescued with great difficulty by old man Redfern and his sons. Jim Redfern's heroism in rescuing Grace has brought the feud to an end, and the story closes with the marriage of Grace and Jim, and the pact of friendship sealed forever between the families of Charlton and Redfern.

THE ROAD TO RUIN (Three parts).—A charming young woman, who is an orphan, is informed by her banker that she has exhausted her funds, and will have to help herself in life's battle. He is of noble birth, but prefers to lead a life of solitude and simplicity. Becoming very much enamored by the girl, he visits his parents, and asks their consent to his marriage. His father is so shocked that he dies of apoplexy. They are married and struggle heroically for the necessities of life.

The old banker is attracted by a beautiful young woman who plays with his affections with the sole purpose of robbing him. He becomes so infatuated that he permits her to invite all the guests at a large ball to go to the bank and continue their dancing in the money vault of his bank. When the Board of Directors hear of this, they request his resignation, and withdraw his income. Becoming hard pressed he tries to sell the bonds that are the property of the young artist's wife. He is detected on doing so, and exposed. The young man and his wife secure the large amount of money from the sale of the bonds, and returning to his home are welcomed by his mother and brother.

GAUMONT.

AT THE HOUR OF DAWN (Three parts).—For centuries, Italy was the battleground of the rival heads of Christendom. They had had numerous troubles, in which first one, and then the other party succeeded, but on the night on which our great drama opens, the leading citizens of Nocera, a small town in central Italy, were gathered together in all their state on the Saturday before Palm Sunday, 1396 A. D. Their business was of a most serious nature, as the notorious Biordo de Michelotti, leader of a powerful band of mercenaries, had sent them a threatening demand, and they were about to receive his envoys. Two emissaries entered, clothed from head to foot in plate mail, and presented their demands. These were to the effect that the citizens were to surrender the keys of the city to Biordo and were to receive him as their lord.

Nocera had been practically independent up till now, merely owing a nominal allegiance to the Pope, who had claimed to succeed to the Duchy of Tuscany. Naturally, they were unwilling to submit to a merciless tyrant, but they knew that in cruelty Biordo was a man of his word, and he had threatened to sack the town if they did not comply. Those who had read of the Spanish fury at Antwerp, or the sack of Magdeburg, will realize what this meant to the council who knew that they had no means of resisting the brigand.

Lorenzo Ferrari, a young hot blood, vowed that he would never see his country the slave of a swashbuckler, and insulted the envoys, but the older men knew that as a fighting force the untrained citizens were useless, and the walls were in a broken condition. Humbly they had to agree to Biordo's terms and come to meet him and grace his triumphant entry, as they had no time to hire other defenders.

This humiliation was too much for Lorenzo to endure, and rather than humble himself to the tyrant, he decided to leave the town, and so that evening he went round to the house of his sweetheart, Gemma. There he and she sadly plighted their troth and received her old grandfather's blessing, and then Lorenzo was lowered over the wall. Next day the gates of the city were flung open and Biordo entered in triumph. The frightened citizens uttered a few half-hearted exclamations as he rode past sheathed in armor. But the moment he had gone his followers poured in and seized the best looking of the women and girls and carried them off beneath their parents' eyes. They were already beginning to feel the misery of being conquered.

Biordo, who having gained power, made all the citizens pay homage to him. To his amazement, Lorenzo Ferrari was not amongst those gathered. He demanded his presence. Not finding him, he ordered Lorenzo's sweetheart, Gemma, to be executed the following dawn, unless Lorenzo was there to take her place. Lorenzo, who had left the town, was only by chance advised of this some time later. He hastily gathered together some of the powerful men of his acquaintance and rapidly descended upon the soldiers of Biordo, who taken by surprise while busily engaged at the ceremony of the execution, were completely overpowered, and Gemma saved only in the nick of time. Thus the town freed once again, lived to praise the name of Lorenzo Ferrari.

THE THREE SHADOWS (Three parts).—La Ravelli was an adventuress of a particularly daring type. After stealing some valuable art treasures from the house of the Countess d'Erriga she caused suspicion to be thrown on Helene, the Countess's secretary. Helene accuses La Ravelli, and the police, who had long suspected the latter of certain crimes, but had never been able to bring them home to her, arranged a sham party, to which La Ravelli was invited. In the midst of the festivities La Ravelli slipped away and, joining her accomplices, went to a room which contained a number of valuable ornaments, and while making a selection the police rushed in and arrested her.

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURES.

WASHINGTON AT VALLEY FORGE (Four parts—March 30).—The great awakening in the Colonies in the spring of 1775; the patriotic activities of Samuel Adams and John Hancock; the midnight ride of Paul Revere; the gathering of the Minute Men and the battle of Lexington—all these important details of Colonial history are shown as a prelude to the intense war romance woven around the situation at Valley Forge during the terrible winter of 1777, when the cause of Liberty looked next to hopeless.

Betty, daughter of a Minute Man who was killed in the battle of Lexington, is stopping at the inn of her uncle, a Tory sympathizer, near the winter camp of Washington's army at Valley Forge. Betty loves and is courted by a rebel soldier, who in reality is a British spy. A detachment of Hessians are occupying the inn when news arrives from Valley Forge that the time is propitious for attacking the Continentals. Betty overhears the plans of the Hessians. To carry word of the proposed attack to Washington, she disguises herself as a crippled boy, and by a clever ruse obtains possession of the written plans of the Hessians.

As she emerges from the inn she meets her sweetheart—the spy. Trusting in him, she tells him of her purpose and he takes the plans and promises to deliver them to Washington. She returns to the inn and removes her disguise. Instead of carrying out Betty's instructions, the spy brings word to the Hessians that Washington will spend the night at the inn.

Betty's brother, who has been granted a leave of absence by Washington to visit his sister, is concealed near the inn. He hears the spy betray his commander. The brother attacks the spy and in the battle the brother is overpowered, but not before Betty learns the true identity of the man she loves.

The spy and the Hessians then plot to murder Washington if he arrives at the inn. Their plans are again overheard by Betty. Before she can do anything, however, the Hessians are hidden in the house, and Washington and Lafayette arrive.

The conspirators intend to murder Washington as he sleeps and he is conducted to a bedroom by the Tory innkeeper. Betty now liberates her brother and tells him to flee to Valley Forge and bring the Continental soldiers to save their general. Betty then goes to Washington's bedroom and tells him: "The landlord says will you take the other room, sir. This one is already taken." Washington, with no suspicion of the girl's noble purpose, is led into her bedroom while she returns and occupies his room.

The spy cannot prevail upon any one of the bloody soldiers to do the bloody deed, so he decides to do it himself. He steals upstairs and into the room he supposes is occupied by Washington. Once beside the bed, he plunges his dagger into the form which is lying before him.

In the meantime, Betty's brother has warned the Continentals of the plot against Washington's life. Lafayette hurries to the inn with a detachment of soldiers. Upon his arrival at the inn he accuses the spy.

"Too late!" cried the traitor, "your commander lies dead upstairs."

At this intense moment General Washington comes downstairs, unscratched. A moment later, Betty follows him wounded to death. She denounces her former sweetheart and dies. The spy is taken prisoner and carried away to await the punishment which is reserved for traitors.

large fortune. That she may not become the victim of a fortune hunter or a man unworthy of her, the will reads that all suitors for her hand must agree to choose from three caskets and that he who chooses rightly shall wed her, while the rejected suitors are sworn to drop their suit and forever remain unwed.

The weaker suitors for her hand are dismayed at the exactments of the testament and abandon their purpose. But there remains two of the suitors, the Prince of Morocco, and Prince Aragon, who are willing to sign away their very lives to win the lady. Portia is cold alike to the suit of these two intrepid noblemen, because she has already loved a young Venetian, named Bassanio. Bassanio, although he loves Portia deeply, feels that he cannot compete to hold a rival place with either of the noblemen owing to his slender means.

He explains his love for Portia as well as his predicament to Antonio, his beloved friend and merchant of Venice. Although his entire fortune is sunk in certain cargoes which are now at sea, Antonio plans to raise money on his credit to speed Bassanio in his wooing. The two friends go to Shylock, a money lender, who has been persecuted and scorned, and thus holds all Christians in hatred. Shylock has a daughter, Jessica, who loves Lorenzo, a Christian and friend of Antonio and Bassanio.

The money lender agrees to loan Antonio the sum of 3,000 ducats, and a bond is forthwith executed to the effect that if the money is not repaid within three months, Antonio is to forfeit a pound of his own fair flesh. Shylock pretends to exact this forfeit in fun, merely to satisfy the technical requirement of the bond, but in it he sees a possible opportunity to satisfy the grudge he bears against Antonio. The merchant believes that his ships will return at least a month before the day of forfeiture. Bassanio unwillingly accepts the money from Antonio and hurries to Belmont to pursue his wooing. Further increasing Shylock's hatred of Christians, his daughter, Jessica, taking with her gold and jewels, elopes with Lorenzo.

In the meantime Portia's princely suitors have put their sagacity to the test, in the matter of each choosing a casket, and failed. Of the three caskets, one is of gold, another of silver, and a third of lead. Both these suitors were misled by the outside show and were dismissed. Bassanio chooses the leaden casket and upon opening it finds that he is the fortunate suitor. Portia gives him a ring which he is to guard as dearly as his life. However, his joy is short-lived because he receives word from Antonio that his ships have all miscarried and that his bond to Shylock is forfeited. Bassanio explains the object of his grief to Portia, and the good lady forces upon him six thousand ducats with instructions to deface the bond.

Portia writes to her learned cousin, Dr. Bellario, requesting that she be allowed to take his place at the trial of Antonio. Dr. Bellario consents and Portia is furnished with the proper credentials introducing her companion, Nerissa, as a doctor's clerk. The two women disguise themselves and hurry to the Court of Justice. In the meantime the trial is under way. Shylock has refused to exercise any measure of pity. He has refused to accept six times the amount of the bond and demands a pound of the merchant's flesh cut off at a point nearest his heart. Antonio gives up his case and says farewell to his unhappy friend Bassanio, while Shylock whets his knife and prepares to take the forfeit of the bond.

Portia, disguised as a young doctor and well supplied with legal advice, arrives with Nerissa. She is already acquainted with the particulars of the case, but she advises Shylock to show mercy. He refuses and Portia tells him that the pound of flesh is his and that he may take it. Antonio bears his breast and Shylock prepares to cut. But at the final moment Portia calls a halt upon him and advises him: "Take thou the pound of flesh, but in cutting it, if thou dost shed one drop of Christian blood, thy lands and goods are confiscated unto the State of Venice."

Shylock then demands his principal and that he be allowed to leave. But this cannot be as he refused it in open court. Portia then shows Shylock wherein he is guilty of seeking the life of a citizen and that by the law Antonio has the life of a citizen, and that by the law Antonio has the right to seize one-half his goods. The court grants Shylock his life with the understanding that half of his goods go to the state and the remainder to his daughter, Jessica, and her husband, Lorenzo. In payment for her legal services, Portia begs that Bassanio give her the ring he wears. Antonio prevails upon his friend to consent and Portia goes away with the ring. When the party of happy friends are again reunited at Portia's mansion, she returns the ring to Bassanio, recalling to him his oath. Thus, Bassanio learns that the young doctor of law was Portia.

WON IN THE CLOUDS (Three Parts).—Cecil James, an Englishman, accompanied by his daughter, Grace, is hunting big game in the wilds of Africa. One day Bangula, a Kaffir, steals a rifle from the gun rack. This is an offense meriting death in that locality, and when Bangula is captured by his fellows he is saved from being pinned to a tree by a hundred spears by the intereference of James. Out of gratitude to his savior, Bangula leads James and his daughter to the fabled diamond mine of the Kabanganas. They leave for the interior.

In the meantime in the city of Bloemfontein, Roy Knabenshue, an American aeronaut, arrives with his dirigible balloon for the purpose of carrying agents of Bjornsen, a banker, to the diamond mines of the interior. Knabenshue falls in love with Bjornsen's daughter, Mary. However, this expectation never materializes as Bjornsen's bank fails and there are no funds to support the object.

In the interior James and his daughter reach a Kaffir village near the diamond mine. From the fact that he smokes a pipe James is taken to be a fire god by the natives. Upon the arrival the Englishman and his daughter meet a white man, Portugese Jack, a renegade, who like themselves, is worshipped as a fire god and is virtually held a prisoner.

James locates the diamond mine and secures many rough diamonds. However things become complicated when the Portugese attempts to force his attentions on Grace. The renegade watches them and when they attempt to escape with the diamonds he reports them to the chief of the tribe. They hide the diamonds in the floor of the feast house where the Kaffirs feed their victims to the lions, and when they finally escape they are obliged to leave the diamonds.

Father and daughter make their way to the town of Bloemfontein and read in the paper of the abandoned expedition of Knabenshue. They offer Knabenshue half of the diamonds if he will aid them to recover the jewels. He consents. The entire party penetrates into the interior and Knabenshue and Mary, his bride, wait in a village with the dirigible until James shall signal them to come to him.

The chief of the Kaffirs welcomes the return of James and Grace. James instructs Grace to signal to Knabenshue while he gets the diamonds from the feast house. The renegade incites the chief against James and the Englishman is to be sacrificed. James is securely tied in the feast-house and a trail of raw meat is laid into the jungle. The lions of the wilds follow the trail and are about to tear James to pieces when Grace arrives and after a battle in which she uses her revolver to good advantage, drives them away. They dig up the diamonds. In a last effort to defeat their purpose, the renegade sets fire to the feast-house.

As they escape from the flaming trap, they see the dirigible floating in the air nearby. While the natives are stupified with astonishment, James and Grace climb aboard and it is none too soon. The renegade explains that dirigible is a mere bag of wind and that a touch of the spear and it will fall dead. A thousand spears shoot heavenward as the natives attack the dirigible, to save themselves the aeronauts throw bombs upon the village. Three terrific explosions and the village is no more. The happy party sails away through the blue ether to civilization and safety.

SAMSON (Six Parts).—Manoah and his wife mourn deeply because both have passed the middle-age mark and yet they are childless. As they become older their sorrow increases until one day the old wife calls upon the Lord and prays that they may have a child to gladden their declining years. An angel appears in answer to her prayer and phopheries that she shall have a son but that his hair must never be cut. The angel also declares that the son shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines.

In due time Manoah's wife has a son and she names him Samson. He grows to manhood and his extraordinary strength is the marvel of his parents and the community. When he has attained a man's estate he goes to Timmath and there he meets and learns to love Zorah, the beautiful daughter of a Philistine. Samson overcomes his father's objections to his marrying a Philistine maiden, and he conducts his parents to Timmath that they may see his bride. While they are nearing the Vineyard of Timmath a young lion roars at Samson. He becomes imbued with the spirit of the Lord, and after struggling with the beast he breaks its jaws.

Arrived at Timmath with his parents the nuptial feast is arranged for and the betrothal is announced. During the interim before his marriage, Samson returns to the spot where he slew the lion and finds that bees have gathered there and have deposited honey in the carcas. Thus at his wedding feast he proposes to his guests the riddle——"Out of the eater came forth meat and out of the strong came forth sweetness——" and he offers to give to him who solves the riddle thirty sheets and thirty changes of garments.

Unable to answer the riddle, the Philistines go to Zorah, and threaten her with death unless she draws Samson out and obtains for them the answer. She fights against their threats and persuasions but she finally weakens and after obtaining the answer from Samson she tells the Philistines. When the final day arrives and they answer the riddle Samson is deeply wrought up against his wife because he realizes her deceit. In his anger he renounces her and leaves her with her father. However, when his anger cools he returns and wishes to become reconciled. But in the meantime Zorah's father has given her to another.

Samson's anger knows no bounds and he goes into the cornfields of the Philistines' and applies the fire brand. Driven to despair, the Philistines blame Zorah's father as the author of their misfortunes and they burn his house consuming Zorah and her father. Weary of the world, Samson seeks a cave on the top of the rock of Etan and dwells there. But the Philistines cannot rest in their hatred for Samson. They gather an army together and go to take their revenge on their enemy and upon the field of Ramath-Lehi, Samson meets the army of the Philistines and single-handed, with the jaw-bone of an ass he gives them battle, slaying a thousand soldiers in putting the remainder to flight.

Samson then goes to the city of Gaze and strikes terror into the hearts of the people by his feats of strength. Sihon, the ruler of the Philistines, plots to take Samson prisoner, and he has the gates of the city locked against him. But when Samson is ready to leave, he wrenches the huge gates from their hinges and carries them away. Samson now meets the beautiful Delilah and is fascinated by her charms. Neither is she blind to the beauty of his strength and she receives him with favor. Making capital of their love Sihon entices Delilah to ascertain from Samson wherein his great strength lies. She refuses but Sihon convinces her that it is a matter of loyalty to her religion and people and she consents.

She leads him to her home and employs her charms to fascinate him and she soothes and coaxes him as only a woman can until he is overcome and tells her: "There hath not come a razor upon mine head—if I be shaven then my strength will go from me." Then a prey to her seductions, he falls asleep and she cuts off his locks and summons Sihon and the soldiers. Then Samson is bound and thrown into prison where his eyes are put out with hot irons. He is then made to grind in the prison house and he is whipped as he works like and animal. When Samson's strength is gone he is for the moment forgotten and as the time passes his hair begins to grow out again.

And when Samson's hair is again grownout the Philistines gather in the Temple and make merry and call for Samson that he may make sport for them. Samson is taken from the prison and led into the temple by a small boy. He is jeered and hooted at by the Philistines and is made to bow and do homage to Dagon the fishguard. Then Samson whispers to his boy guide to lead him to the sustaining pillars of the temple that he may lean upon them. Samson now calls upon the Lord for strength that he may be avenged for the loss of his eyes. The populace are wild with insane joy as they behold the once mighty man now their clown, as they rail and jeer him he places his mighty shoulders to the huge pillars. The frenzied mocking is frozen upon their lips and there is an awful silence. Then the massive pillars totter and crumble before his touch, the magnificent temple curves, collapses and tumbles upon the multitude. In that hour of death, the old, blind, dying Samson totters and crawls over the ruins until he finds a certain form—Delilah—and he falls upon the body of the faithless woman whom he loved.

VERO EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY.

PAGAN ROME (Four Parts).—This recent release of the Vero Educational Society made under instructions of N. Stephen Bush and accompanied with an explanatory lecture, deals with the history of Pagan Rome from the dawn of Roman civilization to the beginning of the Christian era. The first part deals with the period of the kings of Rome, beginning with Romulus. The remains of his tomb give one a very fair idea of the first age of Rome. One of the most interesting pictures in this part of Pagan Rome is the Cloaca Maxima (the great sewer) built by Tarquinius the proud. Many of the ancient temples are shown, and the series then goes into the days of Republican Rome.

It begins with a striking picture of the temples of Castor and Pollux. It shows the trophies of Marius in the Campidoglio: the wonderful tomb of Cecilia Metalla, the most remarkable monument in the history of the world, for it attests the love of a husband for his wife far beyond the grave. The pyramid of Cains Cestius is next shown and then the "Temple of Strong Fortune." There is a glimpse of the forum in the days of the Republic, and presently the scene shifts to the beginning of the Imperial era which for splendor and magnificence has never been surpassed in the history of mankind. We see a most convincing demonstration of the famous saying of Augustus that he found Rome a city of brick and left it a city of marble. The palaces of the great emperors are shown in most interesting and instructive detail. Some of the great theaters follow the imperishable baths of Agrippa and Caracalla, and are of striking and picturesque aspect. Many arches of the famous aqueduct in a most excellent state of preservation are also shown. There are the arches of the great emperors in history, notably that of Trajan, and the monument left by the lavish and munificent Augustus Tiberius up to the days of Constantine. Especial care has been taken to give all that is interesting, striking and picturesque about the arches which the senate and people of Rome built for the emperors upon their victorious returns from foreign fields of battle. These arches are the most eloquent landmarks of Roman history, and more may be learned from a study of them than from many a text book.

Not the least inviting aspect of these pictures lies in the fact that they show the greatness and grandeur of the classic days in their present surroundings often forming a contrast that calls up the memories of the past, and affords much food for reflection. It is indeed a most curious sight to see a military train rushing through what remains of the notable aqueduct of Rome, to see a butcher shop in what, in the classic days, was the portico of an ancient theater, and to see the humble abode of the charcoal seller located in what was once the entrance of the famous theater of Marcellus. The next release of the Vero Educational Society will be "Christian Rome," in three parts.

High Class Motion Pictures
THE J. H. GENTER CO. Newburgh, N. Y. SENECA FALLS, N. Y. March 17, 1914.

Gentlemen:

We noticed in the last issue of the Moving Picture World a testimonial from Mr. George Morgan of the Morgan Theatre, Auburn, N. Y., in regard to his MIRROROIDE curtain. We have a curtain similar to this one which we purchased through the Auburn Film Co., of Auburn, N. Y., about six months ago and will state we started off using a plaster wall for our projection purposes but was induced through Mr. F. W. Spreter to install a MIRROROIDE.

We did not think very favorably of his proposition until he promised to put one in on trial. We, therefore, accepted his proposition and will candidly state that we never regretted for one instant the installation of this curtain.

It certainly is worthy of the name "curtain." We were running our economizer on 60 amperes before installing your curtain and after installing cut down to 40 amperes.

We are able to have a well lighted house which we could not have formerly and this eliminates ushers.

This testimonial is unsolicited. Our reasons for sending same were that we could hardly refrain from notifying you that we are delighted to think we installed a MIRROROIDE.

The seating capacity of our theatre is 750 and is absolutely fireproof, built especially for a picture house, including the latest type of Power's machines, and we think we have one of the best equipped theatres in this part of the state.

Trusting this communication will find you enjoying prosperity, we beg to remain.

Respectfully yours, RENAUD & FORNESI.

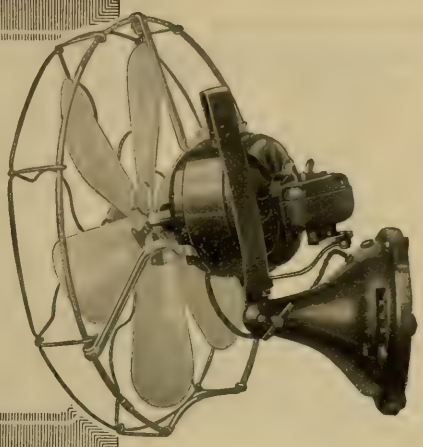
This Trade Mark The Guarantee of Excellence on Goods Electrical.

The Coolest Place in Town



When the thermometer is climbing sky high and not a breath of air is stirring; when it is too hot to go to the movies — or anywhere — make your theatre "the coolest place in town."

Increase your business as you increase the refreshing coolness inside.

Install G-E Six-blade Oscillating Fans; they search out the stuffy corners as they swing from side to side and keep the air fresh and cool. No noise, no vibration, no distraction from the enjoyment of the show.

Insist on G-E Six-blade Oscillating Fans; they are built especially for motion picture theatres. These fans will last you season after season without the slightest trouble or attention beyond oiling once a year.

That is the kind of fans to get—those that will be just as good five or six years hence as they are today.

Every G-E Fan is like that, because there are twenty-five years of experience and knowledge in fan building behind it.

Write us today. Give dimensions, etc., of your theatre and our fan engineers will be glad to lay out a plan for "the coolest place in town."

The ASCO TICKET CHOPPER

The last word in choppers. The proper system for theaters, dance halls and all places where tickets are used.

A New Idea Just what the theater and amusement place owners have wanted for their entrance. Necessity is the mother of invention. That is why we made the ASCO. It was needed, demanded, and the ASCO grants their every wish and demand.

WHY?

The ASCO takes up but little space. Mutilates the tickets entirely or only partially destroys them so numbers can be read.

Cutting Rollers cannot be injured should Coins or Checks be accidently dropped into Chopper.

Appearance, none better nor nearly as good. Cabinets the best. Trimmings regular. All nickel plated. Special trimmings solid bronze.

The ASCO DUPLEX

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

THE PHANTOSCOPE is a motion picture projector, for home, school or salesman.

It uses standard film, which can be rented in every large city, and with hundreds of thousands of subjects to choose from.

Is fitted with lenses standard the world over, the same lenses found on machines costing three and four times as much.

Has a thousand candle-power lamp, producing a picture eight feet wide, at a distance of from 15 to 60 feet, in city or country district.

Turns so easily that a short, light crank is sufficient, for there is but one sprocket and one pair of gears; though you can get it motor-driven if you wish.

And it weighs but 18 pounds, is beautifully finished in nickel-plate, buffed-oxidizing, and satin enamel, with felt feet which will not mar the finest table or desk.

Has patented mechanism giving 92% light efficiency, and a rheostat inclosed in the lamp-house, which is also a patented feature, of which it is intended that this shall be lawful notice to infringers.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self-addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Our Plea for the Clean Feature IS Partly from Business Motives!

Our recent pleas for clean features have been assailed in certain quarters as "advertising" and "actuated by business motives." Why, no doubt of it! It IS good business for us to roast the unclean, sensational feature WHEN OUR FEATURES AREN'T THAT KIND! As long as WE steer clear of bad feature material OF COURSE IT PAYS US TO WARN YOU FROM THE UNKNOWN, CHEAP, TRASHY, "BUNK" FEATURE! UNIVERSAL FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY

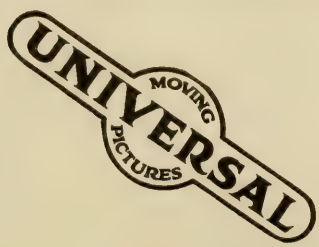
"The Largest Manufacturers of Films in the Universe"

Lucille Love



SERIES

WILL MAKE YOU WILD WITH ENTHUSIASM

Imagine a two-reel picture of such intense interest, of such abounding excitement, of such uncanny mystery that its ending will make your patrons wild with curiosity to see the next two reels, released a week later!

Imagine a two-reel thriller that will actually make the people clamor at your box office for advance information about the picture that is to follow it!

Imagine a two-reel sensation that will be the talk of your town, the talk of the state, the nation and the world!

No series of pictures ever made or ever dreamed of has the absorbing interest, the masterly touch of "LUCILLE LOVE, The Girl of Mystery"—the series which is to run for FIFTEEN WEEKS (two reels per week) on the Universal program beginning April 14th.

Forty-eight great big newspapers have already signed contracts to run the story of "LUCILLE LOVE, The Girl of Mystery," and advertise it throughout their territories. And more are signing every week. We haven't any idea how many more newspapers will snap up this tremendous proposition, but there seems to be no end to it at all.

"LUCILLE LOVE, The Girl of Mystery," is a smashing big story which will be told in two-reel lengths every week for fifteen weeks, BUT EACH OF THE TWO-REEL LENGTHS IS A COMPLETE STORY IN ITSELF, leaving just enough doubt, wonderment and curiosity at the end to make the people impatient to see the following installment.

The demand for it has already become so great on account of our advance announcements that UNIVERSAL EXCHANGES ARE ORDERING GREAT QUANTITIES OF EXTRA PRINTS OF THE FILM IN ORDER TO GIVE QUICK BOOKINGS. When they have seen the first few two-reel installments they will ORDER EVEN MORE EXTRA PRINTS.

Universal exhibitors are the LUCKIEST OR THE BRAINIEST people in the business, for "LUCILLE LOVE" is going to coin money for them and make them more successful than ever in their history.

Now then, the "LUCILLE LOVE" plan is just this. Read every word carefully:

This story was written—right on the grounds at Universal City—by one who is conceded to be the greatest writer of fiction of modern times. His versatility—his plots and the masterful manner in which he wields his pen—has placed him in the front ranks of present-day authors.

We are keeping his name a secret—for reasons to be divulged later—but when we tell you that he has been to the Klondike—to Africa—in fact, all over the world—you can easily guess who it is.

The plot—the cast—the action—have all been thought out and thoroughly planned before we made one move.

And we picked the best papers in the country to co-operate with us—one in each city—in every city of importance in the United States and Canada.

Remember this—we are not going off half-cocked with the Series—we have spent time, money and good hard thought in order to make it a success—the greatest success ever attempted—and we are not leaving it to the picture to help you out, even though it is the greatest picture of its kind ever made—BUT WE ARE BACKING THIS SERIES WITH OUR OWN GOOD COIN.

We want you to bill this picture to the skies—post it all over the place—BECAUSE IT WILL MORE THAN LIVE UP TO YOUR FONDEST HOPES. "LUCILLE LOVE, The Girl of Mystery," will help you where you need it most—at the box office.

Here is the list of papers that will run "LUCILLE LOVE, the Girl of Mystery":

Cleek has solved so many mysteries and proven himself so infallible that he has become a terror to the criminal world. His enemies form a conspiracy against him and the great detective enters a supposed art gallery to find himself gazing down the muzzles of half a dozen revolvers. This is the climax of a film full of mystery and suspense. It is one of the best of the "Cleek" mysteries—and there are no better mystery films being produced.

Important Announcement

I am serving the finest theaters in America—large houses with a big investment which must have great features to produce an income to make a profit.

To secure Real Feature Films for my rental offices I buy the entire rights for America on some subjects.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. I use these films in my high class service in New York State, New Jersey and Eastern Pennsylvania. I am selling the rights to the balance of the States. Every exhibitor in the country can get these films from his exchange by asking for them. He can show in his theater the same class of films that big eastern houses are fighting for.

AN UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIAL

Walter T. Murphy, manager of the big Lyceum Theater, at New London, Conn., says: "It gives me great pleasure to compliment you on 'Vampires of the Night.' I consider this to be one of the season's best releases. Never has more picturesque or beautiful scenery been shown upon my screen. Photographically, and as regards acting, it is indeed a masterpiece. Under all sorts of adverse conditions yesterday I played to the banner business of the season. If 'Vampires of the Night' is to be taken as a criterion of Greene's Feature Photoplays, surely every exhibitor in the country will be watching anxiously for their releases."

Facts and Comments

THE Federal Judges in Ohio have sustained the state law which provides for the examination and approval of all pictures before they can lawfully be shown on the screen. The decision is not a finality. An appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and a final adjudication upon this law may be expected in less than a year. In the meantime the law of Ohio will, of course, be obeyed by every exhibitor and exchange in Ohio and its effect on the industry will be closely watched. The decision makes it very clear that the court ranks the motion picture in the class of amusements, and that it takes no account whatever of the educational films. It is inconceivable to the average American mind that a teacher in an Ohio school could be thrown into prison because he showed a set of purely educational films to the children in his school. We do not believe that the Board of Censors would want to take any such action.

It would be idle to forecast the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The thing for the motion picture interests to do is to faithfully observe even an obnoxious law and then, hereafter, seek relief from oppression in the halls of legislation. If it were possible to select none but ideal men for censors, broad-minded men with high aims and tolerant views, the evils of censorship could be greatly reduced and, indeed, reduced to a minimum. What assurance have we, or what assurance can we have, that such will be the case? None whatever. We will have new censors with every shifting wind of politics. Unless a new breed of politicians is assured to us by a friendly Providence, it is impossible to resist the fear that new avenues of corruption will be opened through the censor boards. The power conferred upon the censors is unprecedented in the political history of our country, and if there is any period in the annals of mankind when arbitrary power has not been abused it has never been recorded.

In all future legislation affecting the motion picture interests the line should very sharply be drawn between the dramatic and the educational picture. If, as the court has decided, the dramatic picture is subject to legal censorship surely the educational film is not. An exemption of the educational picture from all legal restraint and supervision whatever will meet the hearty approval and indorsement of every American. As well might we tax education as impose censorship on the educational kinematograph. At a time when the great educators of the world are awakening to a sense of the educative power of the picture in motion, it would be a most ludicrous anachronism to have a political board put its stamp of approval on kinematographic education. We hope that the traditions of this country have not been Russianized to this extent.

It is altogether probable that with the victory of the censor men in Ohio, there will be similar legislation enacted in numerous other states. Here, then, is an excellent opportunity for enlightened and progressive exhibitors to force lines of cleavage in the censorship of films and to work for an exemption of the educational film from a previous legal restraint. It is well to say in connection with the subject of agitation that the motion picture interests ought to stand united in all such matters—exhibitors, distributors and producers. With a strong organization back of it the industry will be able to fight back and incorporate sane regulation into the statutes rather than drastic prohibition.

FROM time to time THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD receives complaints about the rough treatment of children on the screen. A recent letter to this office is especially emphatic on the subject. The writer admits that the offense is far less frequent than it was in the early days of the industry, but points out that there is no reason whatever for its survival in any degree. There is no complaint more justified than this. As a rule, the children of the studios of the better sort are treated as we expect children to be treated, but even in these quarters there is an occasional lapse and for the sake of a thrill or a laugh, a helpless little human being is subjected to cruel usage.

WE very heartily applaud and commend for imitation the step recently taken by an exhibitor in Rochester. This exhibitor had watched the action of a man who used a tickling lash to annoy women in motion picture theaters. He waited until he was able to catch him in the act and then had him promptly arrested and afterward appeared to prosecute him in the police court. There being no doubt of the offender's guilt, he was made to pay a heavy fine.

A few more convictions of this character would soon rid the motion picture theaters of this pest. Courts will always be found ready to deal severely with such offenders.

The Human Riddle

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WHAT a monotonous place this world would be if all its problems were solved, all its mysteries laid bare! It is in the penetration of mystery, in the solution of problems, that the active mind rejoices, and by active minds I do not mean those submerged in self-contemplation, or those soured by disappointment and envy. Upon one engaged in constantly visiting the various moving picture studios is almost as constantly thrust certain amusing phases of the Human Riddle, particularly a sort of ardent egotism that seems to occasionally afflict those pushed into anxious prominence after a long period of inconspicuous security. The suddenly great are usually in a nervous state about their greatness, either embarrassed by a sense of tremendous responsibility imposed by prominence of position, or uncomfortable over the world's scant appreciation of their large consequence. As one of those miserable cynics who write for publication, I am classed among the unappreciative, but what can one do? Each studio is greater than the last one visited; the product of each is superior to that of any other, if not of all the others combined; only an indurated sense of appreciation could withstand so much eminence of individual and product.

Then there is the actor-gentleman, or the Blazing Staress, with an insatiable longing to attract attention, something like that petted children show when there is company in the parlor, who has a good practical reason beneath the idea of self-publicity, the article written about ME, or the picture of ME in the paper, though it has been sadly proven that no amount of unreadable boosts ever counted in comparison with actual merit of performance. But there is another and more attractive side to the makers and interpreters of visualized stories, one which close observation brings to light.

There are some big and broad minds among those engaged in making this new art a progressive one, men capable of appreciating quite as well as being appreciated. Such men do not regard criticism as an adjunct to a paper's advertising department, and therefore merely an adjunct to a producer's publicity department, and it takes breadth of mind to comprehend the mission of criticism. It takes a big mind to grasp the fact that no art has ever progressed without intelligent criticism. Progress has never resulted from mediocrity weighing against mediocrity, "incompetence applauding its brother." "A gross popular error," says one of the greatest of modern dramatists, "is that it is more difficult to do a thing than to judge it when completed. Action is a blind thing, often dependent upon exterior influences of which it is unconscious, and it is almost as often at variance with its aim. Nearly every successful playwright was first a critic, criticism, itself, being the creative power's finest aim." It takes a big mind to realize that a critic is not simply an arbitrary individual with a chronic tendency to tread on other people's corns and bunions.

These broad men have a practical side—they are not indifferent to the rich rewards of artistic production—but their vision is more extended. They realize that the ultimate has not been reached, that they are fallible, that their work may contain defects unperceived in the building up, that success in the long run comes to those who profit by their errors. One of the compensations of an independent critic's perilous career is a delightful contact with men of such breadth and winning personality. To them moving picture audiences will owe exploration into the mystery of human character and action, attempts to solve the Human Riddle.

It is said that people who are having a new set of teeth put in find it difficult to talk on any other subject, and it would seem at a hearing or two that the interpreters of photodrama were limited to conversation about "my act," but such is not the case. There is a jolly side to the motion picture actor. Go to the Screen Club, and you will find him at his jolliest, or his gloomiest, according to circumstances, and, beneath a surface of self-consciousness that is almost childishly sweet and simple, you will find the same raw material that is in all the rest of us, on which nature has put a distinctive stamp so that we may distinguish one individual from another. If he is really successful in visualizing various shades of human character, it is because there is in him what he releases, and it takes a complicated man to mirror the thousand and one shades of thought and feeling in as many diverse roles.

All of which indicates that there is no subject for literature or drama quite so fascinating as ourselves. Put a number of people on the screen in any sort of action, and the audience regards them much as we do those passing in a crowded street. There is a certain amount of curiosity attached to watching a number of two-legged creatures made of the same clay as ourselves. Bring out one of the characters in a visualized story, even in a roughly correct interpretation of what is passing in his mind and heart, and our attention becomes absorbed. We love to study character by those outer manifestations and signs that expose the complicated workings of a soul. We scarcely know ourselves, are startled to see ourselves as we really are in a mirror, hence it is not a matter of wonder that we should become engrossed while watching, on the screen, any solution of the Human Riddle.

Go to a man's place of business, and you may see him at his best. Go to his home, and you may see his soul contract to its smallest proportions. Watch another man at his work, and you may size him up as one of the meanest you have ever met. Yet he may expand under other influences to strong courage and considerate generosity. If you are a keen observer, you will eventually come to the conclusion that not one man in a thousand could render a definite account of himself, to say nothing of sitting in judgment on his fellows, so complicated, so irreconcilable, are the impulses from within, modified by influences from without, that go into the makeup of one individual, to be expressed in his conduct. The stage and literature have given us few real men and women, rather mere character exaggerations individualized.

It seems to be the mission of the screen to penetrate deeper into inherited directive tendencies and those which form character after birth. All unconsciously, many of the best photodramas are doing this. They do not present a man entirely by his dominant notes, but more in the irresponsible condition of actual life, where his finest aspirations come to naught, where he is tried in a crucible to bring out the best there is in him, where the theory of free will is severely tested. It is said "without the assumption of free will, you can have no drama," but some of the strongest photodramas ever thrown on the screen have disproved this in exhibiting man as a pure victim of circumstances. Moving pictures incline to deal with human character in all of its varied aspects, because their appeal is a broad one, almost universal, and in their portrayals teach us greater truth about ourselves, helping us to better understand one another, even if they do not solve The Human Riddle.

A Glimpse of the Golden Age

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE press agent of a modest legitimate attraction was sitting in the manager's office in a large theater over in Jersey and he and the manager were talking about motion pictures. It came about in this way: The theater in question had never shown motion pictures before and the week following the aforesaid legitimate attraction motion pictures were to have their first trial—not regular motion pictures, but a great classic subject in motion pictures. The two gentlemen were patronizing in their attitude toward the motion picture. They both agreed that the high-class motion picture would "make new theater-goers." In other words they thought that the complete play in films would induce the great mass of picture patrons, who do not as a rule go to the big theaters, to become patrons of the legitimate speaking stage. "These good motion pictures," summed up one of the men, "will give people the habit of going to our shows."

This conversation happened about four years ago. The motion pictures of today are quite different from what they were then and they have become a far greater factor in the amusement world than was then thought possible. The prophecy of the theatrical manager has been in part at least fulfilled. The old motion picture of quality has indeed become a feeder for the bigger theaters, but these bigger theaters are today motion picture theaters. Instead of the motion picture houses of 1910 slowly educating patrons for the speaking stage, the recruits have come to the motion picture theater from the legitimate speaking stage because our pictures have become bigger and better. The dramatic field has been worked by new elements in the art and in many instances they have created new standards and revealed new possibilities. Not all of the old producers have stood still in the last four years. Some of them have well kept their places in the very front ranks of the art. A new impetus, the irresistible impetus of quality, has been imparted to the art and we realize that even our best efforts are still far below the pinnacle which will be reached in the days to come.

The whole world has undergone a new process of education since the motion picture has come into being. Millions upon millions who were utterly without any appreciation of the difference between what is good and bad in taste and in art have learned their lesson and have acquired the faculty of discrimination. No exhibitor today would dare to show, and no producer would dare to produce, for profit and commerce, what was accepted without question six and seven years ago. The great American public today is ready for the best the producers of motion pictures are able to offer. They too have come to realize the delightful and glorious opportunities of this new art and they are constantly refining their taste, because they are constantly learning.

The appeal of the motion picture art is reaching out into the best and most cultured classes. The man of education and special training is no longer afraid to enter the kinematographic field for fear of hurting his dignity, and no man or woman today incurs any perils to reputation by being seen in the motion picture theater. The great army of motion picture friends has drawn its new accessions from all ranks in life, and the man who but yesterday was satisfied with the single reel is today insistent upon the higher aims and missions and possibilities of the new art.

In passing it is but just to say a word of praise to the now much neglected single reel. It was the single reel which formed the stepping stone toward greater heights. The good single reel educated and prepared men for the choicer offerings in the motion picture field. It was the guide that led us through the vestibule into the inner circles. If the single reel had not run its full course there would have been no audience ready for the bigger and better things.

The press agent above referred to was right: The motion picture did indeed make theater-goers, but not in the sense that he meant. Not only will the motion picture in the future keep its own, but it will make motion picture patrons out of the patrons of the old legitimate theaters. The legitimate attraction of merit and reputation will add to the drawing power of the picturized version. Everywhere throughout the country and indeed throughout the world the kinematographic theater is paralleling the old theaters invading them and clustering around them. We are now living in the Golden Age of the Motion Picture. Its influence, both as a medium of circulating knowledge and furnishing entertainment, can scarcely be calculated at this time. We firmly believe that it will revolutionize both the world of entertainment and the world of education.

At present people still speak of "making concessions to the motion picture." The theatrical interests began by making concessions to the motion picture and now the situation has veered around completely and it is the motion picture that is making concessions to the theater. The schools and the teachers still speak in terms of vague appreciation, admitting that for certain branches of education the motion picture has its special uses. The time will come when the motion picture will be indispensable in the schools; more indispensable than the map on the wall or the text-book on the desks. The motion picture will surely revolutionize the architecture of the schoolhouse in the future. At present a grudging consent has to be extracted from the fire departments to allow a motion picture machine to be installed in a school. The insurance companies are eager to enforce extra-hazardous risks and want to tax every exhibition of motion pictures in churches or public halls. It is always thus and always will be. Whatever is new must travel on the up-grade and must fight whatever custom and tradition have firmly implanted in the minds of ninety-nine out of every hundred.

We are now reaching the turning point. If the older order of things gives way at one point it will soon give way all along the line. That is why we say that the Golden Age, the period of peaceful conquest by the motion picture, is almost at hand. There will then be a demand for the newer and better things and especially for what is chiefly or purely educational, such as with our best resources and our most vigorous enterprise it will be difficult to meet. The motion picture will overflow its present limits as a torrent coming down the mountain when the spring is still young. The newspaper has practically abandoned its ancient opposition and has made an ally of what was once believed to be a foe. The church and the school will, in less time than we may now believe, not only cease to cry out against the motion picture, but they will use it as the most effective means ever devised by the brains of man for the religious and educational propaganda all over the inhabited globe.

"A Kingdom at Stake" (Eclipse-Kleine)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

MONOTONY is happily relieved by a view of "A Kingdom at Stake," a three-part subject bearing the brand of Eclipse-Kleine. At least that was the impression left on my mind at the close of the private presentation given for my special benefit.

In the multitude of productions crowded into the film world at the present time, there is necessarily a similarity of theme and story that tends to weariness, if not indifference. The time is near at hand, however, when finer creative skill and worthier effort will be bestowed on the scenario, and then the story paths of the films will show wider divergence and afford the spectator more varied views of complex human life and of the events that accompany it.

Not that it is my intention to convey the impression that the story of "A Kingdom at Stake" is a great one, or one that is most unusual. On the contrary, the story is simple, and most of us have read or heard something like it; but I do not think we have seen heretofore anything like it in films. At least I had not, before the presentation referred to.

There is a tiny tot of a girl in these pictures, who always dominates the scenes in which she appears. Even the prince regent, the chief minister and the grave councillors of the realm, in which this bright-eyed, sunny-hearted darling lives, are placed in the background by her charm of manner and simple innocence. Nor do the stern conspirators who aim at the destruction of the existing government hold the stage when she is near. She is the child queen of this kingdom of romance and rules more by the force of her charming personality than by hereditary right.

It was really a delight for me to watch this child queen. She is so artlessly perfect and always so equal to the occasion! She receives the homage of her elders with the unconscious air of one born to the purple, and scatters her favors of smile and assent with the real show of royal favor. That striking scene where, surrounded by the prince regent and other dignitaries of state, she calmly reads the list of names of the conspirators condemned to death and finds the name of her beloved teacher, Kador, among them, will register itself firmly on the mind of everyone who views it.

We see her writing something at the bottom of the scroll, and then leave her seat to be conducted from the room by her lady-in-waiting. We then see the prince regent take up the scroll and submit it to his fellow councillors. Instead of seeing the royal signature condemning the conspirators to death, we read the two words, "I pardon," and we are just as much astonished as the prince regent and the other ministers of state look. The child was a queen at heart as she wrote the words of clemency.

These films will be handled by George Kleine on the plan of "Quo Vadis?" and other special features.

Vandalia is the name of a kingdom of romance, and Prince Vlademir is its regent during the minority of the child queen, Yolande. The revolutionist party seeks the downfall of the monarchy by the assassination of the child. Yan Kador, a university professor, is chief of the conspirators.

One day he saves a little girl from death near the royal palace. Shortly afterward the state ministers proclaim that a tutor for Yolande shall be chosen by her from a list of professors named by them. Kador is among those who are called to the palace, and he is astonished to find that the unknown child rescued by him is the queen of Vandalia. He is still more at ease, when the child queen choses him for her tutor.

Kador learns to love the child, but his fellow conspirators, ignorant of this, believe that he will aid them in killing her. They induce him to betray to them a secret passage leading to the young queen's apartments. Then they fix a night for her murder.

Kador, in despair, hesitates between treason to his companions and the assassination of the child queen. Then he decides to save her, and confesses the plot to the prince regent. The conspirators are arrested and are about to be sentenced to death, when Kador appears before the council of state and reveals his own complicity. He also is sentenced to die.

The pardon of the revolutionists and of Kador by the young queen has already been referred to. The sequel revealed that the conspirators became Yolande's most loyal supporters.

An Evening With Ben Wilson.

By Thornton Fisher.

Ben Wilson's Early Training for the M.P.'s.

FROM a room on the second floor of the Screen Club, the click of pool balls, followed by animated conversation, will imbue a visitor with curiosity to discover what is transpiring within. He steps through the door in time to see Irving Cummings, Ben Wilson or "Bill" Bailey negotiate a difficult shot for the side pocket, while a group of heroes and villains surround the table and humorously rail at the players.

The writer dropped into the club one evening recently and witnessed a similar performance, which, it is safe to say, will never be thrown on the screen. We found Ben Wilson, alias "Hamilton Cleek," assiduously poking at a diminutive red ball which finally revolved slowly toward the pocket, where it hesitated on the edge for an instant and then fell into the little net. The game was finished. "Come on," said the genial Ben, as he piloted the way downstairs to the club grill, "I'm hungry. Let's have dinner." There in the grill, from whose walls hang ancient yellow programs bearing the names of Keene, Booth and other famous exemplars of dramatic art, we saw the real Ben Wilson.

The first thing about the man that impresses you is his sincerity and candor. His frankness reminds you of a big, unsophisticated boy, and it is this quality that stamps itself indelibly on your mind. He will tell you his ambitions; what he has done in the past; what he wants most to achieve in the future and talks of these things as a lad might who confides in you his consuming desire to become a cowboy or a policeman. You are struck with the naturalness of the actor, and yet with all this apparent youthfulness he is essentially a man's man.

This is evinced should you but spend an evening at the club, for if Ben Wilson is popular with moving picture audiences, he is no less popular with his fellow-players. This large, urbane, blue-eyed fellow typifies the modern hero of the silent drama. He possesses the physical ideal of the role. Some one has said that "hair is woman's crowning glory." Without precipitating a controversy, we humbly suggest that hair becomes man's crown as well. The Wilson locks are luxuriant, unique, novel, curious, curly, wonderful, remarkable, unusual, exceptional, rare and black. There, you have it briefly.

Ben Wilson in real life resembles his character in reel life. He couldn't help becoming an actor. He simply had to. Out in Centreville, Iowa, they raise vegetables and actors. If you were born in Centreville and are not an actor, you are—no; not exactly a vegetable, but an unusual person. Approximately, one hundred thespians have come from Centreville and vicinity. Otherwise it is a perfectly normal, well-regulated little town.

While still in the cradle little Ben probaby realized that his profession was already decided for him. It was only a question of years. So he patiently grew into young manhood and joined a military band at about the time Spain made Uncle Sam mad, and he went with the band to the front—of the Des Moines water works or some place in that city, we don't recall. The organization had no movie operator with it so Ben returned to Centreville where he got a position in a dry goods store at twenty-five dollars a month. It was while he was engaged in this prosaic pursuit that he tried to procure a part with a theatrical company about to leave town. He did not succeed at the first attempt and tried again.

Discovering that the boy was raised in Centreville, the manager of the troupe offered him an opportunity to go with the show. The proprietor of the dry goods store, learning of this, vigorously endeavored to dissuade the boy from the move. He told young Wilson that he (the proprietor) contemplated adding a ladies' suit department to the rear of the building and would place him in charge at the stupendous sum of thirty-five dollars per month. This did not deter the embryo star, who immediately packed up and joined the company.

Wilson was one of the best dressers in Centreville and to-day he is one of the most faultlessly attired men in New York. He doesn't indulge in extremes and his taste in apparel is excellent. His weakness for clothes in those days proved an asset to the company. Mr. Wilson tells how after having made his exit he would doff his suit and hand it to a waiting actor who would don it and wear it for his own entrance. Sufficient clothing for stage use was scarce. Ben stuck, however, and at the end of twelve weeks counted his wages in full. He had received fourteen dollars for his three months' engagement. He complained to the manager, who asked, "How much have I paid you?" "Just fourteen dollars for my twelve weeks' work," replied young Wilson. "Is that so?" said the manager, "then you owe me two dollars."

From this humble beginning, Mr. Wilson gathered the first fruits of his knowledge of stage work. He did not remain long in the middle west, but went east where he played in stock. Brooklynites can remember the tall, black-haired young man who soon became the matinee idol of the city. Three years ago, however, he decided to cast his lot with the moving picture industry and joined the forces of the Edison Company, where to-day he is actor-author-director. Mr. Wilson's roles in "What Happened to Mary" and "The Adventures of Hamilton Cleek" were conspicuous examples of splendid acting.

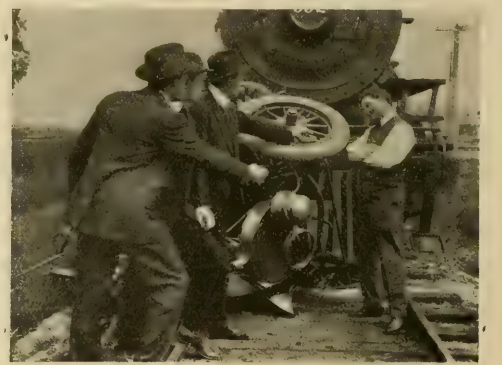
THERE are many perils in attempting a multiple-reel comedy, but the storied form of "Brewster's Millions," dealing with the personal history of one character engaged in a series of exciting undertakings, can stand large development, and it might be called, in the absence of a better designation, a "comedy of adventure." "Brewster's Millions" bears a certain resemblance to the greatest "comedy of adventure" ever designed by the brain of man, "Don Quixote" in extravagance of motive, in the lack of self-consciousness, in its humor and in the mingled shrewdness and credulity of characterization.

Scene from "Brewster's Millions" (Lasky).



Scene from "Brewster's Millions" (Lasky).

The character of Brewster is of grotesque, yet congruous, proportions. Our reasons for laughing are sometimes as elusive as the nature of a well-composed perfume—most of us, if asked why we laugh, are unable to tell exactly why we are amused—but one source is Brewster's misery over his inability to get poor. The interchange of places with what is commonest in our experience, the poor man trying to get rich, is sure to raise the laugh of ridicule, yet it is probably the direct seriousness of Brewster himself that furnishes a generous part of the amusement. As admirably impersonated by Edward Abeles, he becomes a fascinating figure as soon as the main plot is under way.

The directors of the photodrama spend a lot of time in explaining a few simple facts and run the risk of scattering interest that should be steadily augmented. The facts are that Monty Brewster's paternal grandfather grossly insulted Monty's uncle on his mother's side and the latter makes his will so that no money inherited from the grandfather shall play a part in the boy's career. Monty is therefore compelled to dispose of one million under certain limitations of method in order to inherit seven millions from his uncle. This being the natural starting point of interest, it is a matter of importance to get at it as soon as possible.

Monty goes at impoverishing himself in an impulsive and boyish sort of way, gloriously confident that it will be the easiest thing in the world, but he falls into traps of his own setting. He joins a losing game on the stock exchange with such enthusiasm that he turns the tide in favor of those who were expected to fail. He backs an opera company naturally destined to walk home, and it scores an unqualified success.

He now becomes haunted with a dread of good fortune. Success of any kind becomes a source of misery, with occasional relief when he is held up by a highwayman or robbed by a trusted employee. He revolts against the snares and deceptions of those who would help him along in the world. He savagely resists the efforts of friends to rescue his motor car when it becomes stalled on a railroad track with an approaching train in sight. Under a pretense of cranking up, he pushes back when they try to run it off the track by hand, and his unhappy face brightens when the car is struck and smashed into scrap iron.

His account book, shown at intervals on the screen, indicates that he will not be able to get rid of a million in accord with conditions imposed by his uncle's will—it even looks as though the defaulting employee will make good—when Monty hires a palatial yacht and at last hits a pace that is bound to tell. He comes close to losing time through a serious adventure at Algiers, the result of a boyish prank, but involving the safety of disinterested Peggy, sweetheart companion of his childhood. Monty shows that he is very much of a man in spite of his whimsical struggle against good luck.

He rescues Peggy by an exhibition of personal bravery and decides to visit the North Seas. His guests mutiny and lock him up in a cabin as one demented. He escapes, hoists a signal of distress and is salvaged by a passing steamer at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars. When he is at last impoverished, he finds it difficult to escape well-meaning friends, but he attains his object and marries Peggy who loves him for himself. At a critical period, when he has only two dollars left of the million left by his grandfather, he is informed by telegram that one of the trustees of his uncle's estate has defaulted with the seven millions he was to receive as a reward for impoverishing himself, but he feels rich in the love of a true-hearted girl, and the telegram turns out to be a practical joke. Monty wins a noble wife and a splendid fortune besides.

There is more than one little undercurrent of sound sense beneath the flow of nonsense in "Brewster's Millions." It is made obvious that getting rich becomes easier as a man's fortunes rise superior to his requirements. Then, as man is lifted above the cares of hundrum life, the haunting fears and pains of deprivation and humiliation disappear, leaving him at a higher viewpoint, where purely material distress seems small and mean. Still deeper is a glimpse of our social imperfections, those which will evoke laughter some day, when they are overcome and transcended.

Well worthy of mention is a beauty of treatment in "Brewster's Millions, especially in large ensembles like those of the ballroom and the Shiek's harem, occasionally in such fleeting glimpses as that of a balcony at Monte Carlo. The subtitles help. "Take that typewriter to Tiffany's and have it overhauled." "Get a dozen orchids for McLeod—and take a taxi." These merely illustrate a running fire of humor that stimulates, rather than impedes, the action. With an amusing plot, plenty of adventure, admirable characterization so far as the central figures are concerned, and charm of treatment, "Brewster's Millions" seems to be a successful contribution to Lasky quality of production.

Julian M. Solomon, Jr., formerly manager of the Susquehanna Theater, Philadelphia, and now with the World Film Corporation branch in that city, was a recent caller at the New York office of the World. He was in tow of Epes W. Sargent, who loves to stop and look in queer store windows on side streets, so it is probable Mr. Solomon had a merry chase while in the city.

"The Treasure of Sultan Abdar Rahman"

An Exceptional Pathe in Five Parts—General Film Company Special Release.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature takes us miles away from the commonplace, it abounds in big dramatic values skillfully elaborated. Everything about this production wears the gloss of novelty and attests not only the art, but in no less degree the enterprise of the producer. There are fine romantic touches in the early part of the story, reminiscent of Oriental fancy and tradition. From the ancient Arabia we are, by a most artistic transition, brought into the modern Arabia and it is all part of the same logical and forceful plot.

Scene from "The Treasure of Sultan Abdar Rahman" (Pathe)

The Sultan Abdar Rahman accepts a treasure of rarest value in ransom for the delivery of the daughter of a hostile chief. Fearing the changing fortunes of war, the Sultan hides his treasure in a grave-yard and then in a cryptic document records the hiding place. When later his palace is attacked by his enemies, a faithless slave, who had watched his master hide the paper in a black box, possesses himself of the box and runs away. His act is discovered and he is hotly pursued. Rather than give up the box he plunges to his death in the bottom of an abyss carrying the box with him. His pursuers are unable to find the box and it lies at the bottom of the abyss for many centuries.

Scene from "The Treasure of Sultan Abdar Rahman" (Pathe)

The world has changed mightily when the box is found by a poor Arabian woman who has gone to the well for water. She picks up the box and brings it to her husband, who opens it and discovers the strange document with the mysterious letters. He does not know what to do with it and offers it to a French officer as a curio. The officer buys it and then gives it to a learned Arabian to have it translated. The Arabian ponders over the ancient scroll for some time when at last its hidden meaning reveals itself to him. The hidden meaning he keeps to himself, while he gives the literal meaning to the French officer. Taking advantage of his discovery, the Arabian translator hastens to the spot where the treasure is buried. He discovers it and loads it on the back of his horse, after which he rides away as fast as he can. His trickery, however, is discovered and he, like the faithless slave centuries ago, is hostly pursued. He is caught, but not until he has thrown the treasure down into the depth of an inaccessible gorge. What follows then constitutes one of the most striking and original climaxes in the whole range of dramatic kinematography. Out of the mouths of a number of caves at the bottom of the abyss huge lions come forth and surround the treasure, while the title hits the psychological moment by saying that "the treasure of Abdar Rahman is not for man, but for the kings of the desert."

Acting, settings, photography, are all of A1 quality. "The Treasure of the Sultan Abdar Rahman" is indeed a masterpiece.

DOROTHY GISH.

FOR a long time Dorothy Gish was commonly known as "Lillian Gish's little sister." Try as she did to get away from the appellation it still clung to her. Now, however, with Dorothy featured in "Judith of Bethulia," and "The Mountain Rat," a special Reliance feature in four parts, her big sister, Lillian, had better look to her laurels. Dorothy is a beautiful blond lassie and in "The Mountain Rat" takes the role of a dance-hall girl who accomplishes the regeneration of a wastrel. Those who have seen her in both "Judith of Bethulia" and "The Mountain Rat" are enthusiastic over her work. Many of Dorothy Gish's admirers who followed her fortunes with the Biograph Company have transferred their affections to the Reliance films now that Dorothy has followed in the footsteps of her director, D. W. Griffith.

The story of "The Mountain Rat," in which Dorothy Gish takes the leading role, was written by Mary Rider Mechtold, the well known short story writer whose fiction works appear regularly in the magazines. Miss Mechtold picked Miss Gish for the part and those who have seen the finished film pronounce her judgment a wise one.

Dorothy Gish plays the part of Nell, known as "The Mountain Rat" by the miners of the little settlement town in which she lives. In the town dance hall she meets Douglas Williams, an Easterner, who, rejected by his Eastern sweetheart, comes West to forget his sorrows.

Williams falls in love with Nell and although Nell's mode of living is not a strictly conventional one, the young Easterner and she, after a misunderstanding which threatens to wreck both their lives, are reconciled, adjust their little differences and settle down to a tranquil married life.

AGAINST MOTION PICTURE LIBELS ON RACES.

A meeting of the Committee for the Protection of the Good Name of Immigrant Peoples was held in the library of the law offices of Simmons & Harris, at 198 Broadway, New York, on Saturday, April 4th. The meeting had been called to take steps for the correction of a notorious evil. Mr. Simmons, the chairman of the meeting, had invited representatives of various film producers to discuss ways and means for suppressing the motion picture caricatures on certain nationalities. Several companies, among them the Edison, Kalem, Lubin and the Universal, had sent representatives.

Mr. Simmons, in opening the meeting, declared that it was a great injustice to impute certain crimes to nationalities rather than to individuals. He referred to certain films which imputed the crime arson mostly to Jews, while in reality the Jews committed no more crimes of such a nature than any other nationality. Mr. Simmons added that statistics proved the imputation was unjust and without foundation, in fact.

Several of the representatives of the companies named spoke on the subject and advised Mr. Simmons to confer with the National Board of Censorship which would co-operate with him. Mr. Simmons took this suggestion under advisement and will probably get in touch with the chairman of the Board of censorship.

Marguerite Bertch, to nice handling by Director Ince, or to splendid acting, particularly that of Anita Stewart, what results as a consequence of their combined efforts is a noteworthy photodrama.

It would almost seem as if the impossible had been attempted so far as the remarkable situation is concerned, hence I feel that Ralph Ince, on whose shoulders would have fallen the responsibility of failure, deserves most encouragement, if a reviewer's account can be so construed, though the reviewer may never be credited with judgment in adverse criticism. Ince drives straight at the subject by showing an orphan boy placed in an asylum by an unhappy young mother, and her subsequent agreement not to make herself known as the real mother when a wealthy widow, Mrs. Castro, adopts the child. The preliminary scenes are brief and clear, and, having disposed of them, Ince concentrates on the important action, which takes place some twenty years later on.

The boy, Earle Castro, has attained majority, and is idolized by his foster-mother, when he goes to Paris and falls madly in love with a beautiful and popular actress, Madame Rene, none other than his natural mother. The director was compelled to take a chance in order to make this plausible. In opposition to the expected, he presents her as one of those rare women who preserve their youth and augment their beauty in a pursuit that brightens their minds. It was the best thing to do under the circumstances, and it is so admirably done that it goes.

Anita Stewart becomes an important factor, in the finest performance she has ever shown on the screen, and her portrayal of natural attraction to the boy is one well calculated to hold any audience rigid with attention. One high scene after another between the beautiful mother and the ardent boy, unaware of each other's identity, leads up to arrangements for marriage and ultimate renunciation procured by the boy's foster-mother, when she arrives. The love quickened between natural mother and son partakes of that quality described by T. B. Aldrich in "Marjory Daw," as existing between father and daughter, though, in this case, a tremendous peril is involved, one that is barely averted.

The boy does not recover when taken back home—the natural mother is one he would have probably idolized as a mother—and he falls a victim to melancholy. Meanwhile, Madame Rene seeks consolation by asking permission to see the child she left at the asylum. It is granted on condition that she makes no betrayal of identity. She is allowed to look at him through portieres and is overcome by the consequent revelation. She falls in a faint; the boy rushes to her aid and finds the object of his eternal love. The end is powerful and consistent, one to be seen rather than told.

British Notes

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

A PLEA for the improvement of films shown to children is being made by a prominent worker of the National Union of Woman Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, Mrs. Foard. She quotes an instance from a natural history picture, which has proved very popular in this country, depicting a stag hunt, and she gives credit to the producers for having the good taste to omit the killing scene. This brings to my mind a recent curious contratemps which occurred in a Northern city. In a private program exhibited to the press a film released by a Chicago house concluded with the execution of a "rustler" by stringing him over the branch of a tree. Although the incident was an obvious fake an influential newspaper—The Yorkshire Observer, to wit—found reason to condemn the scene in pretty plain terms, but some time later accorded unstinted praise to "Quo Vadis?" and the arena scene. Self-improved censorship is becoming a fetish with British institutions and the above body is by no means the first to consider itself qualified to dictate what ought and what ought not to be shown on the screen. Fortunately none have so far materialized or conditions for exhibitors would be intolerable.

A London scribe complains of the growing practice of "tipping" attendants in picture houses. The men with electric torches he says, are beginning to show a significant courtesy and consideration in selecting you a seat and he knows of more than one theater where it is almost as necessary to tip the attendant as it is in a French restaurant.

"Leah Kleschna" has been released once in this country from another source but treated upon ambitious lines it should prove an excellent subject for spectacular display.

At last Wednesday's meeting of the Exhibitors' Association Mr. L. Schlentheim advised the committee to take up some action against alleged bribing of managers and film selectors by the agents of film dealers. It is feared that this matter will raise a delicate point as to what constitutes bribery. Several instances are being whispered of reviewers accepting substantial presents from manufacturers, but how many if any, of these can be verified is yet to be seen. Does a box of cigars constitute bribery? If it does I am afraid there would be a long list of cases to consider by the Exhibitors' Association Committee. J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

"At the Hour of Dawn."

Romantic Story of Mediaeval Italy Beautifully Portrayed by Gaumont—A Three-Part Feature.

FEATURE buyers and exhibitors who know how to present a feature properly will find much to delight them in the Gaumont three-part feature, "At the Hour of Dawn". This picture is based upon a story of mediaeval times and happened in Italy—1396 is the year named. According to the story Biordo di Michelotti, a notorious bandit, seizes the city of Nocera, a small town in central Italy, the inhabitants being unable to resist his demands. When the emissaries of the bandit make their demands Lorenzo Ferrari, a hot blooded young patrician, insults them and declares that he will not remain to see his city humiliated.

Scene from "At the Hour of Dawn" (Gaumont).

When the conqueror comes and takes possession he demands that Lorenzo be produced, but no one knows where he is. Biordo then demands that Lorenzo's sweetheart be held as a hostage against his return. Subsequently the girl makes an attempt upon the life of her captor when he forces his unwelcome attentions upon her and in anger Biordo commands that she be executed at the hour of dawn if Lorenzo does not appear to take her place at the headsman's block.

By chance strolling musicians, chanting the story of Lorenzo's flight and the impending death of his sweetheart, discover Lorenzo at an inn and arouse him to attempt a rescue. Aided by a band of braves who hate Biordo, Lorenzo swoops down upon the town just at the nick of time and, defeating Biordo and his bad, rescues his sweetheart and the city from the marauders.

Scene from "At the Hour of Dawn" (Gaumont).

The features of the picture are the massive settings which make most real the mediaeval atmosphere. The walls of the city and the tower are genuine, relics no doubt of the day of which the story is told. The scenes in the old church where the townspeople are praying for deliverance are impressive and the choir singing the Stabat Mater affords an opportunity for organ effects that will appeal instantly to the enterprising exhibitor. The scenes of the tolling bells can also be used to good purpose.

The picture abounds with scenes in which large assemblages and mobs are shown. There has been no attempt to scrimp the numbers employed to make these scenes effective. The soldiers look and act like real soldiers and the costuming of the townspeople is so true to the best conceptions of the period that the illusion is perfect. There is a distinctly religious tone in the subject that adds to its impressiveness and characterizes it as a feature of the highest type.

"The Floor Above"

A Four Part Reliance Feature from an Oppenheim Story.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

A WEAK plot does not always spoil a novel—the literary graces of the writer may save it from failure. It is quite different with screen plots. In the vast majority of cases the success of the film play rises no higher than the strength of its plot. This production of the Reliance Company is an adaptation of one of Oppenheim's more recent pieces of fiction. The adaptation could not, I think, be improved upon, the settings and the photography leave nothing to be desired and, above all, the acting is far away above the average from Henry Walthall down, but the defect of a weak plot is radical and this keeps even such an excellent production as this from the success which it would otherwise score.

There are a series of dramatic incidents; there is plenty of splendidly filmed narrative, but the central idea is not strongly dramatic, and the climax, while logical, is not thrilling or powerful.

Scene from "The Floor Above" (Reliance).

Even characterization of the finest type does not wholly cure the fault and there is surely a lot of fine characterization all through the play. The weak and frivolous, but lovable and docile, sister of the strong woman who helped to unravel a mystery of crime, the detective with human traits, the foolish stage-door Johnny, the jealous roue, the butterflies of the musical comedy—all these portrayals were thoroughly convincing and true to life. Had the materials been less barren of deep dramatic values this company and this direction would have shown to very much greater advantage. Even as it is, the production charms by its obviously superior quality in all except the plot itself.

"The Murdoch Trial."

Miss Florence Turner Gives a Fine Interpretation in a Four-Part Drama of Unusual Power.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

FOR sustained interest, freely sprinkled with thrilling situations, this 3,400-foot production of the Turner Films will rank unusually high. It is a picture that without hesitation may be classed as "Broadway stuff," if by that designation is meant the highest-grade studio product. Larry Trimble is the author as he is also the producer. "The Murdoch Trial" is carefully thought out; it is planned so that it can be smoothly executed with an absence of incongruities, major or minor. Furthermore, there is a real story. It grips right at the beginning and never loosens.

Miss Florence Turner is at her best. Which is only another way of saying what all picture lovers know, that when Miss Turner is given the big part in a real story she is great; and so she is here. Miss Turner's year abroad has in no measure dimmed her art—she has not forgotten any of the individual touches the possession of which long ago established her as one of the first in the hearts of picture patrons the world over. A twelvemonth in England unquestionably has benefitted her health. She is the Miss Turner of old—always sure of a situation—as mirth-provoking in farce as she is amusing in comedy, convincing in drama, superb in tragedy; and "The Murdoch Trial" is a tragedy.

Scene from "The Murdoch Trial" (Turner Films).

Miss Turner has the role of a young woman whose father dies in India, leaving to his daughter, Helen, a hundred thousand dollars in the custody of Murdoch, not knowing the latter is in financial trouble. A letter to Helen telling her of the situation never reaches her. A nephew of Murdoch, as unscrupulous as the uncle, destroys it and pretends to burn the letter of instruction to Murdoch. The nephew tries to win Helen; she cannot bear the sight of him. When the uncle learns that Helen has a lover he determines to win the girl himself as the surest means of self-protection. There is a quarrel between the uncle and the lover when the latter is detected in a clandestine meeting with Helen. Lionel threatens to kill the uncle. Later Murdoch and his nephew get into an argument when the latter shows to Murdoch the letter that makes Murdoch a defaulter. The nephew stabs and kills Murdoch. The butler, looking on from another room, falls unconscious. Lionel, returning to the house to make sure that Helen is safe, enters the room where lies the body just as Helen comes in another door. Each believes the other has committed the crime. When the nephew comes in with a servant the former accuses Lionel and summons the police. The butler's mind is unhinged.

At the trial Lionel is convicted. As sentence is pronounced Helen startles the court by asserting that she did the killing. The butler, in a sanitarium, restored but not released, reads that Helen is to be executed the following day for the crime. He escapes and notifies the attorney, and they with Lionel, ride to the residence of the Home Secretary, after previously capturing the nephew and taking him along. A reprieve is secured.

This is the bare outline. It gives no indication of the many strong situations that stir the blood and of some that stir the heart. Frank Tennant is excellent as Lionel. One of the strongest characterizations is that of the butler, by Mr. Felton, who appears by courtesy of the Hepworth Company. Richard Norton has the difficult role of Murdoch. G. C. Colonna is the nephew. He displays a tendency at times to slip into the vill-yun class. Eric Forbes-Robertson is strong as the merciless prosecutor. In the momentary appearance of the butler of the Home Secretary the friends of Mr. Trimble will recognize the figure of the former Vitagraph director.

We cannot close this review without a word of praise for the staging and direction of the trial of Lionel. It is as compelling in its entire course as it is moving in its climax. The photography throughout is evenly good.

"The Hunchback."

A Two-Reel Production Released by the Mutual Majestic Company.

Reviewed by Harry W. De Long.

THERE is much in this two-reel picture that appeals to the sympathetic side of human nature, although it be dormant, perhaps is, in some; sordid in others and apparently dead in the few, it cannot be killed—a spark remains to be rekindled into commiseration for the unfortunate. Deformity is a misfortune visited on a comparative few and this small percentage have much to contend with. Such is the burden that the hunchback is called upon to bear in this visualization, "The Hunchback." He is a poor tinker with a heart as large as his hat and an unselfishness as big as himself. He is compelled to obtain the usual necessities of life and peregrinates from house to house mending umbrellas, soldering tinware, etc. His deformity is a great hindrance to him, as children are frightened at his appearance, although he has an inborn love for them that amounts almost to a mania. When he finds a little child seated on a doorstep crying because her doll is broken, he spends his last cent for a new one to conciliate her and is turned out of his cheap boarding house on account of his extreme penury. In desperation, he climbs into a freight car and finally lands in the west where he finds friends in a prospector and his little daughter. The father is accidentally killed by a premature blast in the mine and it devolves on the hunchback to father the child.

Scene from "The Hunchback" (Majestic).

Years pass and the hunchback's ward buds into charming womanhood. The hunchback, realizing that existing conditions cannot continue, and loving the girl with all his soul, explains to her their positions and asks her to marry him. This is an impressive scene. She cannot consent as she does not love him in that way; only as a daughter.

A young prospector appears at this psychological moment. He saves the hunchback's life in a peculiar way and gains his gratitude. Later the conditions reverse and the hunchback, in the same manner saves the young prospector from a horrible death, though through jealousy and opportunity he almost fails in his duty. This is the gripping part of the picture—the "punch," and causes intense suspense on the part of the spectators. This is not what will be denominated a pretentious picture, but it contains elements and situations that will be remembered. The setting is superb. Never once does Frank Turner, as the hunchback, lose an iota in his delineation. Lillian Gish is sympathetically sweet as the grown-up girl. William Garwood as Tom Carson, the young prospector; T. Haverly, the miner and father, and Edna Mae Wilson, as the child, are all superior in their various roles. The photography is bright. The director and author deserve special mention. An exceptional moral tone prevails, and spectators will coincide with the reviewer in this, I am confident, that the closing scene is beautiful, satisfying and impressive.

"Love and Vengeance"

Ford Sterling, in a Rattling Two-Reeler Produced by Henry Lehrman, Makes His Universal Debut.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IT IS a most auspicious beginning that Ford Sterling makes in his first Universal picture, which will be released on April 23rd. For a background he has the recent Vanderbilt Cup race, and about this exciting even Producer Henry Lehrman has woven a most convincing comedy—convincing because the race seems an incident of the story rather than that the story seems an incident of the contest. In the course of the race there is one event that bulks big—it would bulk big in the mellowest sort of melodrama. A racing machine comes to grief directly in front of a camera. The machine drives right up to you. Before the overturning you can see it is in distress. When the sensational smash does come—it all happens in a flash—it causes a thrill such as one might experience in looking at the original instead of the pictured event. The mechanician is seen climbing out of the wreck and running blindly out of the scene. What the cameraman may have been thinking it is easy to imagine; certainly he did not do what the average man would have done, and with complete justification—he stuck to his post, and obtained one of the rarest pictures ever thrown on a screen. It was a real opportunity, and he had the sand to rise to the occasion. In order to mollify those who may take exception to a somewhat cold-blooded and commercial treatment of a subject that might be supposed to appeal only to the more morbid, it may be added that no fatality resulted, remarkable as it may seem, and both driver and mechanician are now as well as ever.

Henry Lehrman.

Scene from "Love and Vengeance" (Sterling).

Before we really get back to Sterling it should here be pointed out that in his support was none other than the head of the Universal, Carl Laemmle. Mr. Laemmle occupied a seat in the grandstand just behind the one the comedian tried to hold down, but from which he was compelled to make frequent excursions in order to restrain the enthusiastic young woman who refused to be interested in him and only in the driver of car No. 2. The president of the Universal kept his eye away from the camera and evidently hugely enjoyed the excitement and the goings-on about him. With him were Mr. Fichtenberg, the well-known amusement man, and Fred J. Balshofer, of the Sterling Company. Mr. Lehrman, in a turned-up Panama hat, had a bit to do in his own picture when he engaged in a colloquy with the comedian.

"Love and Vengeance" is a characteristic Sterling production. It is not enough to say that there are no dull moments in it, for there are many that will cause hearty laughter. In the beginning, Snookee, portrayed by Mr. Sterling, has an altercation with a man who fights with his right shoe, which he hurls with most unerring aim. Snookee retaliates with various loose bricks. The cause of the disturbance is a rather stout woman. Snookee gets the best of the argument and also the woman, but it is not long before his eye rests on the figure of a younger woman, who, with a circular pocket mirror has been reflecting in the eyes of the two the rays of the sun. Snookee remonstrates with the mischievous young person, but under the charm of her eyes his wrath fades. His affections experience most rapid transference; there is a fly in the ointment in the form of a racing driver, however. It is for him that the new charmer has eyes only.

Snookee gets desperate when it looks like No. 2 coming in a winner. With a hose he sprinkles the course. Then things happen in chunks. Machines skid all over the road. Always Snookee seems right in line for a bump. He gets it going and coming. Automobiles go backward and forward and sometimes sideways. Policemen essay to straighten matters out and instead are themselves straightened out. It's all a new kind of machine-made comedy—and that is no disrespectful pun, either. What those skidding machines do in the way of stunts is almost past belief.

We are not going to attempt to outline the many good things in this unusual production. Suffice it to say, an exhibitor may go the limit on it, confident that from his grouchiest patron he will pull a laugh and also a real thrill. Furthermore, it is as clean as a whistle. There will be many who see "Love and Vengeance" who will believe that the young woman playing opposite Mr. Sterling is none other than the one with whom he has appeared in so many pictures. There is a strong resemblance. Emma Clifton will make an effective foil for the comedian; it is quite safe to say we will hear much of her in time to come. Mr. Lehrman has got together a most efficient company. Every member of it displays the agility and the absolute disregard for the retention of anatomical unity which seem so essential these days in the making of this popular style of comedy.

HOW ONE FELLOW GOT WORK IN PICTURES.

Clarence A. Taylor, the Broncho Hiker, who started from New York, September 19th, 1913, to walk to the Broncho Motion Picture Studio at Santa Monica, Cal., arrived there March 22nd, 1914, the trip taking him three days over six months to do. In that time he covered 5,650 miles. He passed through eighteen states and traversed sixty-five miles of war-ridden Mexico.

Mr. Taylor comes from Bridgeport, Conn., and being attracted by the breezy, western photoplays that the Broncho Company releases, was anxious to enter their ranks. He wrote an application letter to Mr. E. H. Allen, of the Broncho Company, and Mr. Allen being in a facetious mood, replied that they did not advance fares to prospective employees, but if he walked across the Continent he would give him a job.

Mr. Taylor, being game, started out with Henry O'Neil, who quit at Atlanta, Ga. Taylor made his way through the country lecturing and showing a reel of film which Mr. A. Kessel, Jr., president of the Broncho Motion Picture Company had had taken of the Broncho Hikers in different parts of New York and shaking hands with the Mayor at the time of their leaving. The Mayor gave him a letter to the Mayor of Los Angeles. Needless to say at this time, Clarence Taylor is on the payroll of the Broncho Motion Picture Company.

BALTIMORE EXHIBITORS TO GIVE BALL.

G. L. Wonders, manager of the Wilson Theater, of Baltimore, has been in the city during the week making arrangements for the Baltimore Exhibitors' ball, which will be held in the Fifth Regiment Armory on May 16. Mr. Wilson was accompanied by a committee of three exhibitors. The quartet have been visiting the studios arranging for the presence at the ball of photoplayers and film men.

Dinner to John F. Skerrett

Elaborate Testimonial Comes as a Surprise to the Head of Nicholas Power Company.

WE ARE prepared to wager our last dollar that April first brought no greater surprise to anyone in the little village of New York than it did to General Manager Skerrett a few minutes after 8 P. M. of that evening. To mark the celebration of his first anniversary with the Nicholas Power Company, his associates and friends had completed arrangements for a dinner, and so well had the secret been kept by everyone that Mr. Skerrett was inside the door of the banquet room at Mouquin's, Sixth Avenue and Twenty-eighth Street, New York, before he realized the full import of the gathering. Over sixty friends of Mr. Skerrett, including fellow workers in all departments of the Nicholas Power organization and representatives of different branches of the moving picture industry, or city departments with which Mr. Skerrett was formerly connected, and of the leading trade and theatrical publications spent a most enjoyable evening and testified, one and all, in no unmistakable manner to the high esteem and regard in which Mr. Skerrett is held by everyone whom he comes in contact.

John Francis Skerrett.

Louis C. Mouquin, of the Mouquin Company, was on the committee and excelled himself in the arrangements of the banquet, providing a menu that left nothing to be desired. The various courses were interspersed with a number of excellent musical selections, both vocal and instrumental. Among the many excellent numbers were those by Templar Saxe and an original composition dedicated to Mr. Skerrett, entitled, "The Cameragraph Rag," composed by Messrs. James and Frank Saullo. It took the many friends of Mr. Skerrett several hours afterward to extend their felicitations. It is impossible here to enumerate the list of those who expressed their pleasure at being present and who extended their congratulations to the guest of the evening and to the Nicholas Power Company. It was a genuine love feast, and the expressions of regard and esteem tendered to Mr. Skerrett by all present were only excelled by the remarks of the different heads of the departments associated with him in the Nicholas Power Company. The feelings of loyalty, regard and co-operation that were expressed by his various associates explain, perhaps more than anything else, the success which has come to the well-known makers of the Cameragraph machine, especially during the past year. The Committee of Arrangements was "Captained" by Arthur J. Lang, and included Mr. Edward Earl, secretary and treasurer of the Nicholas Power Company, and Messrs. Wendell P. Milligan, H. T. Edwards, Joseph Honey, S. S. Cassard, William Barry, Louis C. Mouquin and Jacob Stiefel.

Mr. Lang proved an energetic and most capable toastmaster, and the success of the evening was largely due to his untiring efforts. He was ably seconded by Will C. Smith, of the Nicholas Power Company, who was responsible for the compilation of chorus numbers for most of the musical program. The handsome souvenir menu folders had an excellent photographic reproduction of Mr. Skerrett on the front cover. In expressing his appreciation of the gathering, Mr. Skerrett minimized the importance of his own individual work and gave due credit to all the members of the large staff, including Assistant Manager Smith, Mr. Lang, Mr. Cassard, Mr. Barry and especially Mr. T. Uhlemann, superintendent of the factory. The one regret of the evening was the absence of Nicholas Power, the president of the company, who at last reports was in Luxor, Egypt. Mr. Power is expected to return home shortly.

The Censorship Decision.

Court Believes That Question of Freedom of the Press Is Not Involved—State Declared to Have Supreme Controll Over All Matters Pertaining to Motion Picture Theaters—An Appeal to the United States Supreme Court Has Been Filed.

AS EXCLUSIVELY reported in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD of last week, Federal Judges Warrington, Day and Killits handed down a decision sustaining the constitutionality of the Ohio Censorship Law and denying the applications for an interlocutory injunction made by the Mutual Film Corporation and the Mutual Film Company.

In view of the fact that this is the first time the question of censorship of motion pictures has been passed upon by a court of justice, the Moving Picture World publishes the full text of the opinion of the court in full, with citations as a matter of information and record as follows:

Per Curiam. The ultimate question in these cases is whether a State has power to regulate the public exhibition of motion pictures. The statement of the question would seem to present a simple problem; and yet it is earnestly contended that the general assembly of Ohio has through its enactment violated grave constitutional guarantees. The contention is not that persons displaying improper pictures may not be punished after the fact; but it is that the display itself cannot be prevented. This is not a denial of the existence of evil practices growing out of this class of public exhibitions; it is a challenge of the power of the State to avoid such practices through the exercise of any measures of prevention. The issue then is one of remedy, and its nature is seen in the difference between the avoidance and the practical endurance of such evils as may exist.

The complainant in each case is a corporation, one having been organized under the laws of Ohio and the other under the laws of Virginia, and each is engaged in business as a distributor of moving picture films. The defendants in each case are the same: the Industrial Commission of Ohio, and the Board of Censors of Motion Picture Films, with their respective members. The former board was created under an act approved March 18, 1913 (103 Ohio Laws, 95-110), and the latter under an act entitled "An act providing a board to censor motion picture films and prescribed the duties and powers in the same," approved May 3, 1913 (103 Ohio Laws, 399-401). The first act is not directly involved, except a single section to which we shall later have occasion to allude; and the body of the second act is hereinafter set out. The complainants seek to enjoin the enforcement of the second act, and this accounts for the presence of three judges (Judicial Code, Sec. 266). The bills are in the usual form and substantially alike. They will be sufficiently understood by setting out the substance of their pertinent averments, in connection with our consideration of the objections urged against the validity of the second act.

No question of jurisdiction is presented. Diversity of citizenship in the first case and the presence of Federal questions in both cases, are admitted; and the latter are sufficient to vest the court with jurisdiction, even though it should decide the Federal questions adversely to the complainants, or, finding it unnecessary to pass upon such questions, should decide the cases on State questions alone (Siler v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 213 U. S. 175, 191; Mich. Cent. R. R. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 63, 64; Louisville & Nashville R. R. v. Siler, 186 Fed. 179, 179; Ohio River & W. Ry. Co. v. Ditty, 203 Fed. 537, 589).

The second act, called by counsel the censorship law, has not been passed upon by the Supreme Court of Ohio, nor, so far as we know, by any court of the State. The main strength of the argument in support of the suits is aimed against the constitutional validity of the act; it appears in the margin. Examination of the act plainly discloses an exercise of the State's police power; and no one doubts that this power extends to the making of regulations "promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety" (Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 471). Presumably the general assembly was convinced that the business of exhibiting motion picture films was attended with such public evils as both to warrant and demand regulation; and in the measures adopted have reasonable relation to that end, it is not open to the judiciary to interfere. It does not matter that the subject in the main is harmless; it does matter, however, if something is associated with it that is harmful; and it is only when it clearly appears that the enactment has no real or substantial relation to the subject or is unquestionably an invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, that the courts either of the United States or of the State of Ohio interfere (Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, Vol. 202; Schmidinger v. City of Chicago, Ibid 578, 587, 588; Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 31; Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 609; Noble State Bank v. Haskell 219 U. S. 104, 111; Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 429; Board of Health v. Greenville, 86 Ohio St., 1, 20, 23). This is but recognizing the "principle long established and vital in our constitutional system, that the courts may not strike down an act of legislation as unconstitutional, unless it be plainly and palpably so" (Booth v. Illinois, supra, at p. 431); and, as Judge Donohue expressed the rule prevailing in Ohio: "A court is not authorized to adjudge a statute unconstitutional where the question of its constitutionality is at all doubtful" (Board of Health v. Greenville, supra, at p. 20).

Having these principles in mind, we shall consider as briefly as we may the objections urged against the constitutional validity of the statute.

(1) In the argument at the bar it was insisted for complainants and in the briefs it still is, that the statute violates the freedom of the press under the guaranty of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Ordinarily it would be enough to say of this, as Mr. Justice Miller said in Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County, 134 U. S. 31, 34: "That the first eight articles of the amendments to the Constitution have reference to powers exercised by the government of the United States and not to those of the States," and see Lloyd v. Dollison, 194 U. S. 445, 448. Recognizing the controlling force of this rule, complainants associate the first amendment with the clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, providing "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States"; then they seem to regard this as unimportant, and at last rely on section 11 of Article I of the State Constitution, which provides:

> "Every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of the right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech, or of the press * * *."

It is claimed, as before pointed out, that this provision contemplates legislation providing for punishment after an act forbidden is committed, but that such an act cannot be prevented. Thus decisions which establish the right simply to punish, i. e., such, for instance, as People v. Most, 171 N. Y. 423, or Tyomies Pub. Co. v. U. S. of America, decided March 3, 1914 (C. C. A. 6th Cir.), * * * are not questioned. It is urged on behalf of the State that the question so presented is met by the rule that the corporate complainants are not citizens within the true meaning of the guarantees contained either in the clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or of the Ohio Constitution, before quoted (Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 259; Western Turf Ass'n v. Greenberg, 204 U. S. 359, 363; Selover, Bates & Co. v. Walsh, 226 U. S. 112, 126; Orient Insurance Company v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 560); but since these decisions did not involve the Ohio guaranty, we prefer to consider the statute upon its merits.

It is averred in the bills:

> "That the motion pictures, the films for which are purchased, sold and leased by complainant, depict dramatizations of standard novels and short stories and the performance of standard dramas, * * *; that they also exhibit many subjects of scientific interest, such as showing the various uses that may be made of electricity, showing the manner of development and growth of various forms of animal and plant life, giving pictures of trips of exploration * * * and pictures of other subjects covering a range as wide as life itself, which are educational, instructive and amusing.
> That one of the most important classes of subjects exhibited in complainant's motion picture films is the depicting of events * * * described in words and by photographs in newspapers, weekly periodicals, magazines and other publications * * *; this regular furnishing and publishing of news through the medium of motion pictures being done under the name of the 'Mutual Weekly.'"

It is contended that the Mutual Weekly, so described, is as much a press enterprise as are any of the standard magazines, periodicals and newspapers; and that unless it can be safely affirmed that the State may provide for the censoring of newspapers and magazines, the present statute cannot be sustained. We cannot believe that this question is in reality involved. Counsel overlook a broad distinction between the things they describe in their bills and the objects with which they make comparison. Analysis of the bills and affidavits, not to speak of familiar knowledge, serves to show that an exhibition of these motion picture films, with its enclosure, surroundings and attendants, has all the material attributes of an ordinary theater. The State of Ohio had prior to the enactment in question made detailed statutory provisions respecting the construction and maintenance of buildings in which moving picture films might be publicly exhibited, and had imposed penalties for violation of such provisions (6 Ann. Gen. Code, pp. 121, 123). The business in which complainants are confessedly engaged would have no reason to exist if the picture films they supply were not employed as the means of furnishing entertainment at these exhibitions. The films are, so to speak, the actors, the stage players, to produce the drama (Kalem Co. v. Harper Bros. 222 U. S. 55, 61) or other entertainment. The object and the ordinary and natural tendencies of such enterprises are to attract people; and of course as the picture films increase in range and variety, so does the attendance. It is true the statute does not make direct provision as to either exhibitors or places; but indirectly it does this and more; it provides in effect for licensing the films of which the proposed exhibitors can publicly display (Secs. 4 and 7 of Act, supra). Why then is this not the practical equivalent of a plan to regulate these public exhibitions, the picture film theaters, through the old system of granting and, if necessary, revoking, or withholding, licenses? Since the State has in effect declared the existence of public evils growing out of these picture film exhibitions, which require regulation, what court can rightfully say, in cases like these, either that such evils do not exist, or that the measures adopted are not reasonably designed to correct the evils?

If this interpretation of the statute is at all admissible, it is a mistake to ascribe to the legislature a purpose to do anything inimical to the principle of freedom of the press. It was seeking to accomplish a totally different object. It was apparently providing that the most salutary principles of a public license should be applied to the use of this new instrumentality in places of amusement. It can make no difference what its use achieves or constitutes, whether it be a drama, a publication, or other means, in the manner and the place of use that must come to the law-maker. It is to be remembered, too, that the guaranty here invoked, like other guaranteed rights and privileges, is to be reasonably restrained and so reconciled with the exercise of the fundamental powers and duties of the State in relation to the public at large. Counsel's argument assumes a degree of repugnancy between such privileges and powers which in logical effect would unnecessarily sacrifice the latter; for it denies to the State the right simply to protect the public against immoral acts. As Mr. Justice Field said in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 89: "Even liberty itself, the greatest of all rights, is not unrestricted license to act according to one's own will"; and see Board of Health v. Greenville (supra at p. 22). It was never supposed there was any repugnancy between the legislative power to regulate theaters and the guaranty of freedom of the press. Complainants' counsel place special reliance upon a decision, which, when read in connection with a later decision of the same court, presents a good illustration of this. We allude to Bailey v. Superior Court, 112 Cal., 94, where it was held by a divided court that a judicial order forbidding the representation, upon a theatrical stage, of the facts of a particular criminal case, then on trial, was an infringement of the State constitutional provision which protects the right of a citizen freely to speak, write, and publish his sentiments. But later the same court, in Greenberg v. Western Turf Ass'n, 148 Cal. 629, when speaking of the right to license and regulate vocations and employments, and to prohibit exhibitions, shows, places of amusement, and the like (without as much as alluding to Bailey v. Superior Court), held (1288):

> "The State in the exercise of its police power, has the unquestioned right to regulate those places of public amusement, and it is in the exercise of this power, and not at all as having to do with civil rights, that the act in question was upheld in 140 Cal. (and 73 Pac.), and its constitutionality is here again affirmed."

And in Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 309, an ordinance regulating moving pictures, and making it unlawful for any person to conduct or carry on a moving picture exhibition, without first applying for and receiving consent, was sustained; and the appellate court, in the Supreme Court in the Greenberg case did not find it necessary even to cite the decision in Bailey v. Superior Court. The reason for this no doubt was that the judiciary does not, while the legislature does, possess authority to regulate theaters, it is not meant by this either to signify approval or disapproval of the decision in Bailey v. Superior Court (Commonwealth v. McGann, 213 Mass. 213, 5; Pompeo v. Colorado, 36 Colo. 364, 369). We need not dwell upon the familiar power of a State to provide for the granting or withholding of licenses as a means of regulating theatrical performances; it is sufficient to say that any reasonable exaction or denial of such licenses is universally regarded as a proper exercise of the police power (Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, 72, 73; Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St., 534; Commonwealth v. McGann, supra, 213, 216; The People v. Duffy, 231 Ill. 490, 344, 345; Bracken Theatrical Co. v. Gilbert, 82 Ohio St., 1, 6; Cooley's Const. Lim., 7th ed., p. 884, of 6th, 2 Story Const. 5th ed., sec. 1944; 2 Blackstone Com., 37th ed., p. 1074). This power to give or withhold licenses may be exercised to public speaking in the highways or public grounds within municipalities (Davis v. Massachusetts, 167 U. S. 43, 47; Love v. Judge of Recorder's Court, 128 Mich., 542, 549; Pitts v. City of Atlanta, 121 Ga. 567, 568; in sales, the sale of Music v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, and the class of licenses following it, prevails in Ohio as to purely local matters (Zanesville v. Gas Co., 47 Ohio St., 1, 30, 31); and since complainants devote their films to a use in which the public is interested, they must for that reason submit to the control of the public so long as they continue such use (Atlantic Coast Line

R. R. Co. v. City of Goldsboro, decided by the Supreme Court, February 24, 1914.

Furthermore, the right of a State to regulate the use of moving picture films has been repeatedly upheld in other jurisdictions, though we do not discover that the question of interference with the freedom of the press was presented in any of the cases. In State v. Leden, 117 Md. 373, and act providing for the regulation of moving picture machines in the city of Baltimore, and for the appointment by the governor of a board to be known as the "Board of Examining Moving-Picture Machine Operators," and vesting the board with power to issue, suspend, or withhold licenses, to enact fees for the issuance of licenses, and after paying the members of the board for their services and expenses requiring them to pay any surplus to the State treasurer, was passed upon; the court, besides denying certain objections presented against the validity of the law, held (380-1):

> "The act was to protect the people of Baltimore City against consequences resulting from the work of incompetent moving-picture machine operators, and was passed in the exercise of the police power of the State, and does not in our opinion violate either the Federal or State Constitution."

In Block v. City of Chicago, 339 Ill. 251, an ordinance was upheld, which required those engaged in the business of exhibiting moving pictures to secure a permit for the exhibition of such pictures, and forbade the chief of police to issue such a permit for the exhibition of any obscene or immoral pictures, though it required him to issue a permit without fee or charge respecting pictures not of that character. To the same effect are the decisions in: Laurette v. Bush, supra; Higgins v. Lacroix, 119 Minn., 145, 150, 151; Dreyfus v. City of Montgomery, 58 So. (Court of Appeals of Alabama), 730, 732. See also State v. Morris, 76 Atl. 479; People v. Gaynor, 137 N. Y. S., 196, 199; McKenzie v. McClellan, 116 N. Y. S. 645, 646. It results that so far as the foregoing constitutional provisions, either Federal or State, are concerned, the statute is sustainable as a license measure and so, as to the claims thus far considered, is not an undue interference with any right of complainants.

(2) It is claimed that the statute violates the Commerce clause. Substantially all the films supplied by complainants are manufactured outside the State of Ohio. The films are brought into the State in shipping packages containing one or more tin boxes in each of which is a film wrapped on a core. When the packages reach their destination in the State they are opened and the films taken off the shipping cores and put on reels, and then placed in the stock of an exchange. The reels are then distributed among the exhibitors and passed from one to another for purposes of public exhibition. Some of these films circulate wholly within Ohio until worn out, while some remain there for a brief period. It is to the films so placed on reels that the statute applies. The statute in terms limits the duty of the board of censors to examination of "all motion picture films to be publicly exhibited and displayed in the State of Ohio." They must be submitted to the board before they are delivered to exhibitors for exhibition, and the fees charged are fixed by uniform rates according to the length of "each reel of film" (Sec. 3 of Act, supra). We are of opinion not concerned with shipping packages which pass into and out of the State in their original form. It cannot be said, then, that the act imposes any sort of burden upon the original shipping packages; for when the packages are broken and their contents placed upon reels, the films have lost their distinctive character as articles of interstate commerce (May v. New Orleans, 178 U. S. 496, 508). It is said that the use made of the films is similar to that made of books belonging to circulating libraries; but we do not see how this feature can affect the question now under consideration. While the films are in use for public exhibition within a given State, they are like any other property owned and used in the State. It can make no difference that all are not consumed through use in a particular State and that such as survive are shipped into one or more other States and there similarly used; for in each instance commerce ceases where local use commences. Above all the films that are open to action of the board are subject to uniform treatment and charge, no matter in what State they originated or who may own or supply or use them in Ohio and whether such persons be resident therein or not. It is in vain then to urge that the statute violates the commerce clause (Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall., 148, 153; Machine Company v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 679; Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 314, 322; Patapsco Guano Co. v. North Carolina, 171 U. S. 345, 354, 359; Brown-Forman Co. v. Kentucky, 217 U. S. 563, 575; Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 525).

(3) It is said the statute is not sustainable as an inspection law under Section 10, Article I, of the Federal Constitution. It is to be observed that this provision forbids a State, without the consent of Congress, to lay imposts or duties on imports or exports except as may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, and the net produce of such duties and imposts shall be for the use of the Federal treasury. The objection is aimed against the fees authorized by the present statute and the requirement that they shall be paid into the State treasury. This does not seem to be important. In the first place, the word "imports," as used in the Constitution, does not apply to property brought from one State into another, but only to imports from foreign countries (Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 628; Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall., 123, 136). In the next place, if films should be imported from foreign countries into Ohio, it could not now be presumed that the authorized fees would be more than are absolutely necessary for executing the law. And, as Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said in Patapsco Guano Co. v. North Carolina (supra, at p. 354): "If the receipts are found to average largely more than enough to pay expenses, the presumption would be that the legislature would moderate the charge"; (see also Red "C" Oil Co. v. North Carolina, 222 U. S. 380, 393). It is only when such fees are proved to be in excess of the necessary expenses and their exaction is persisted in, that judicial interference will be warranted (Foote & Co., Inc., et al, v. Stanley, decided by the Supreme Court February 24, 1914). Moreover, this objection is based upon the assumption that the statute is an inspection law. Even if this were accepted as the true characterization of the statute, its enactment would remain an exercise of the police power and so would not change the result.

(4) It is argued that the statute delegates legislative power to the board of censors in violation of Sec. 1, Art. 2, of the Ohio Constitution. The theory is that the statute fixes no definite standard for determining what films shall be approved or disapproved by the board; but that this is left to its judgment and discretion and so in its essence is legislative. The language of Sec. 4, supra, is:

> "Only such films as are in the judgment and discretion of the board of censors of a moral, educational or amusing and harmless character shall be passed and approved by such board."

It may be conceded that this language might have been extended by descriptive and illustrative words, and yet it is not at all certain that the act would have been any more intelligible than it is now. It would probably have been more restrictive, and its purposes more easily thwarted. In view of the range of subjects which complainants claim to have already compassed, not to speak of the natural development that will ensue, it would be next to impossible to devise language that would be at once comprehensive and automatic. Is it correct, then, to say that the enacted standard is insufficient? It seems to us to find analogy in many subjects of approved legislation. Thus, boards of health have been accustomed to prosecute inquiries into and to determine the facts of the existence or not of nuisances and other local conditions injurious to health. Boards and officers are frequently employed to inspect and pass upon private buildings with a view of having changes made as respects sanitary objects, fire prevention, and the like. These are but some of the illustrations that are adducible to show not only the necessity, but the practice of lodging discretion in subordinate agencies in the interest and for the protection of the public. Government administration and regulation could not be adequately carried on, or even rationally exist, if everything of a subordinate and yet injurious character had to be passed upon by the legislative bodies themselves. Inevitably, then, some discretion must be lodged somewhere; and where could it be more appropriately placed than in the administrative boards created and selected for the execution of such laws? It was said by Chief Justice Cartwright in Block v. City of Chicago, supra (239 Ill. at p. 258), when considering an ordinance which prohibited the exhibition of "immoral or obscene" moving pictures:

> The purpose of the ordinance is to secure decency and morality in the moving picture business, and that purpose falls within the police power. It is designed as a precautionary measure to prevent exhibitions criminal in their nature and forbidden by the laws * * *.
> The audiences include those classes whose age, education and situation in life specially entitle them to protection against the evil influence of obscene and immoral representations.
> Again, when passing upon an objection that the ordinance fixed no standard, it was said (263):
> Manifestly it would be impossible to specify in an ordinance every picture or particular variety of picture which would be considered immoral or obscene, and no definition could be formulated which would afford a better standard than the words of the ordinance.

We think the present question is in principle resolved to complainants by the decision in Board of Health v. Greenville, supra. There the State Board of Health was authorized to determine whether the contamination of any stream amounted to a "public nuisance detrimental to public health or comfort"; and upon the Board's affirmative finding, after approval by the Governor and Attorney-General, a municipality or person could be required to install works "satisfactory to the State Board of Health for purifying" any such stream. See also Fairview v. Giffee, 73 O. S. 183, 189, 190; Rose v. Baxter, 7 O. N. P. (N. S.) 132 * * * affirmed without report 81 O. S. 522; Theobald v. State, 30 O. C. C. 336, 338, 339. In this latter case the court upheld the law as amended, which, in its original form, had been condemned by the Supreme Court in Harmon v. State, 66 O. S. 249. We think the standard fixed by the statute now under consideration will bear favorable comparison with that prescribed by the amended act passed upon in the Theobald case, and that the instant cases are distinguishable from Harmon v. State for that reason. We are thus constrained to believe that under the present rule of decision of Ohio alone, the primary standard here prescribed is sufficient to avoid the charge that legislative power is delegated (C. W. & Z. Railroad Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton County, 1 O. S. 77, 88, 89—per Ranney, J.). And our views as to the sufficiency of the primary standard are strengthened by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (Red "C" Oil Co. v. North Carolina, supra—222 U. S. 394; Monongahela Bridge v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 192, 193; Int. Com. Comm. v. Goodrich Transit Co. 224 U. S. 194, 214; Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 27; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 382).

As to the suggestion that the board of censors is invested with arbitrary power, it is sufficient to say that under Sec. 8 of the act, supra, provision is made for reviewing any order of the board in the Supreme Court of the State. This remedy was given by creating in any dissatisfied person in interest the same right of review that is given in respect of orders of the Industrial Commission. Sec. 12 of the act creating that body authorizes an action to be commenced in the Supreme Court of the State to set aside, vacate or amend an order that is either unreasonable or unlawful; and the Supreme Court is invested with "such revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of administrative officers as may be conferred by law" (Art. 4, Sec. 2, Ohio Const.).

While we have considered all the objections made to the statute, it is not necessary to prolong the discussion. We are unable to find anything in the act that is opposed to either the State or Federal constitution. It follows that the application for an interlocutory injunction in each case must be denied. However, in order to enable complainants to take an appeal in each of the suits directly to the Supreme Court of the United States, pursuant to Section 266 of the Judicial Code, and to apply to that court for orders of suspension or supersedeas, if they so desire, we have concluded to suspend the operation of the orders of denial herein for a period of fifteen days from the date of their entry.

The Mutual Film Corporation through its attorneys has announced its intention of appealing to the Supreme Court of the United States. A stay of fifteen days has been granted to defendants to prepare and perfect their appeal and this time may be further extended. Notice of appeal has been filed by Mr. W. N. Seligsberg, of counsel for the Mutual Film Corporation. Mr. Seligsberg, in speaking of the decision and opinion of the court, said in an interview with a representative of the Moving Picture World:

> Have just received the opinion in our censorship cases from Cleveland, and have only had a short time to study it. It is not becoming in the defeated litigant to criticise the Court, and yet, in its decision, the Court permits us fifteen days in which to take an appeal or apply for a further stay of proceedings under the Ohio Censorship Law, pending the appeal. This indicates the weight of our contentions, as it is very unusual practice to grant a defeated litigant further stays. The Court does not squarely decide the question which we presented, as to whether motion pictures are entitled to the protection of the constitutional provision guaranteeing freedom of publication of sentiments to all persons. The Court avoids this by saying that under the police power, theatrical and motion picture exhibitions may be licensed, and any reasonable restrictions thereon are justifiable. However, the Court loses sight of the fact that the police power can only be exercised within the limits of the Constitution, and that where an attempted exercise of the police power violates a specific constitutional guaranty, the guaranty must prevail.
> It would be true, for instance, that the sale of newspapers in the public streets might be restricted by oppressive license requirements. That, however, would not justify a law forbidding the sale of newspapers unless they had been censored, and we think that the Court will sustain this view and refuse to permit censorship under the guise of a licensing restriction. We shall, therefore, avail ourselves of the Court's permission to appeal, at once.
> Despite their decision against us, the complainants appreciate very much the care and attention which Judges Warrington, Day and Killits gave to this case. We appreciate that an inferior court is usually reluctant to declare a State law unconstitutional, and we feel confident that the appeal, which will immediately be taken, will be successful.

Greene's Photoplay Enterprise.

Forms Company With Offices In New York—Will Make and Import.

A DECIDED innovation in the business has been inaugurated by W. E. Greene, who has boldly allied film renting with manufacturing and importing. Mr. Greene is one of the oldest film men in the trade and, while personally known to a legion of exhibitors throughout the east, is not a stranger to western theater men who have heard of the strict business methods he employs in his offices. "My advent into the importing and manufacturing branches was foced upon me," said Mr. Greene. I am furnishing film service to the finest theaters in the east and am compelled to use considerable discrimination in the selection of subjects. There is more film on the market today than at any time in my recollection, but it is just as difficult to secure good subjects as it ever was. In buying film I religiously follow these rules:

W. E. Greene.

"I will not purchase an obscene or objectionable film. In following this policy I am protecting the exhibitor against himself, at a loss to myself. I do not consider this a financial loss, however, for in the long run I believe I will profit by my decided stand on this subject.

"I will not purchase a film that is not good photographically and in acting. A fine film can be shown in the large houses as well as the small houses, while a cheap sensational film which might do well in certain little houses would fall flat and even be an object of ridicule in the better theaters.

"As I said before, I have been forced into the manufacturing and importing end. I will continue to purchase from others the best films I can find, but the supply of such films is not sufficient for my needs, and I shall import and make enough film to give me a plentiful supply of top-notch subjects.

"This manufacturing department is entirely subservient to my film rental interests. I shall use the pictures in my own offices for New York State, New Jersey and Eastern Pennsylvania, and sell the balance of the territory to other exchange men. Every film that I advertise for sale is one that is actually in my own service, and which has been passed upon by myself and competent assistants."

Mr. Greene had some interesting data on the evolution of the film renting business. "In the east," he said, "where there are about 6,000 theaters, the great majority of them very fine houses, I find that the good film is treated with more respect. It is not so many years ago that the film was treated with contempt and was used simply as a chaser. The film never got a square deal in big houses, for when the last act was over the house lights were thrown on and the poor picture pitifully struggled on the screen against adverse conditions, hardly visible on account of the projection being killed by the house lights.

"Today we find these big vaudeville theaters actually cancelling acts to make way for a multiple reel production, and the managers are paying considerable attention to proper projection. Furthermore, it is possible to secure consecutive 'time' for a good film.

"Higher admission prices will come naturally as in the vaudeville business. Years ago this branch of amusement was in the same condition as the film business is today. The theater manager booked his own acts, and on account of the variety to select from the name 'Variety' was no doubt coined. The theater manager used his own judgment, and often booked acts without seeing them.

"Today vaudeville theaters are getting a high price of admission because they can give a uniform bill of quality secured through competent booking offices.

"I am handling my exchanges on the same basis. If, in spite of the care and discrimination exercised in purchasing film, I should find that one of my pictures is not pleasing the public I would rather keep it out of the service than send it to one of my customers to hurt his business. With the rules we follow in buying film, however, there is very little likelihood of such a thing occurring.

"Among the films I have bought, and which are being used in my own service, are 'Vampires of the Night,' in five parts; 'The Great Gold Robbery,' in three parts and 'A Modern Mephisto' in six parts. I have more to follow, and expect to release under my own trade-mark two big features each month."

Mr. Greene's latest enterprise is known as Greene's Feature Photoplays, Inc., with offices on the fifth floor of the World's Tower Building, 110 West 40th Street, New York.

"Where is Coletti."

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IF it were possible to de-Germanize the atmosphere of this comedy it would be safe to praise it highly. Even as it is there is enough of what is international in humor and what transcends the boundaries of speech and nation to make the comedy laughable. Madge Lessing plays a clever, though not the leading part in the feature and she is as usual, dainty, funny and sparkling.

The plot of the story, while not entirely original, is skilfully contrived and fairly holds the interest of the spectator, though the denoument is somewhat weak. Parts of the feature are excellent, notably the splendid bull-dog, of which we hardly see enough.

Coletti is the name of a famous detective who is accused by the editor of the Daily Mail, of negligence, because he had been unable to discover a criminal in a big city, although the criminal had stayed in the city for twenty-four hours after the commission of the crime. Coletti, injured in his professional pride, offers to prove how easy it is to disappear in a big city without any trace, and for this purpose he disguises himself as a street cleaner, while his barber disguises himself as Coletti. A series of amusing scenes follow. The city is plastered with huge posters containing a likeness and a description of Coletti together with a reward of a large sum of money to any one able to trace the famous detective. No one is able to find the real Coletti, but the pseudo Coletti is easily discovered and chased all over the city and even into the air. He is caught and then reveals his true identity, greatly to the chagrin of his pursuers. At this moment the bulldog is called in and at once establishes himself in the regard of the audience. He takes up the scent (just where he found it is not explained), and trails Coletti, who is disguised as a woman, into his hiding place, from which the famous detective emerges and surrenders just five minutes after the allotted four and twenty hours.

"The Song of Solomon."

Two-part Edison Comedy.

A DECIDEDLY interesting comedy-drama, "The Song of Solomon," corresponds very closely to Brunetiere's theory on what are absolutely necessary charactistics of any drama. The brilliant French critic declared in a series of lectures delivered at the Odean Theater, Paris, that an essential principle to be regarded by all playwrights is found in a clash of contending desires, the assertion of one human will against others offering strenuous opposition. "If obstacles against which the hero contends are insurmountable, then there is tragedy, and the end of the hero is likely to be death. Change the obstacle so as to equalize chances in the same conditions of struggle, those of human will in opposition, and we have comedy."

Scene from "The Song of Solomon" (Edison).

"The Song of Solomon" tells the story of a composer who stakes practically all that he has, his position in a publishing house, his individual resources and all that he can beg, borrow or steal, on the success of a song he has created, and his struggles, while containing many elements of comedy, particularly because of Edward Bouldon's admirable impersonation, are so pathetic at times that the piece might well be called a tragi-comedy so far as its effect is concerned.

Scene from "The Song of Solomon" (Edison).

A little more than is necessary is made of Solomon's agony of mind while in the throes of composition, but any one of keen musical sensibilities will appreciate his misery while trying to compose in an office devoted mostly to the sale of songs, such as are peppered in with the salt of moving picture offices near Times Square. That he succeeds in spite of a shrieking soloist on one side and a howling trio on the other gives a preliminary view of his unquenchable ardor and magnificent determination. There qualities support him after he is discharged, when he begins a plucky campaign to interest the reigning Broadway star, "Trixie," charmingly impersonated by Sally Crute.

The desperate measures taken by Solomon to get his song before the popular favorite of the day constitute a series of amusing adventures, with an undertone of pathos, and culminate in his obtaining an apartment next to the expensive one she occupies in spite of his extreme poverty and a thousand intervening difficulties. He is not permitted to ride over these difficulties in the purely arbitrary manner which makes scenario writing so easy for amateurs and the completed product so wearisome for those who go to the picture shows.

There is no violation of plausibility in the action. Solomon has to fight every inch of his way from the conventional starting point clean through to the end, and that is what makes his uphill struggle interesting. Mr. Miller is to be congratulated for his fidelity to the legitimate requirements of his story. He does not ask us to believe the unbelievable. His story is one true in its motive and, better still, is so logical in its handling that it carries the conviction of actual truth, a life portrayal.

GEORGE REEHMS.

GEORGE REEHMS, who for the last year has been staging Royal and Komic photoplays for the Mutual Film Corporation, has been actively interested in motion pictures since 1906. For seven of those years he was connected with a large motion picture firm in Philadelphia, which he left to accept the position he now occupies. One of the striking features of Mr. Reehms' career is the fact that during the major portion of it he has been one of a trio whose position is unique in the motion picture world. He has been almost constantly associated with Walter Stull and Robert Burns and the combination has been a winning one.

George Reehms.

The three write their own plays, stage them and act in them. In every case one of three directs the production while the other two take part in the picture. All matters of importance arising during a production of one of their pictures are subjected to a vote of the triumvirate. The vote settles the discussion, for "majority rules" is an unwritten law of the combination.

Mr. Reehms was born in 1881 and in 1898 entered upon a stage career. For eight years he appeared in various comedy and dramatic roles before transferring his efforts to the motion picture stage. His ability rapidly developed during his engagement with the Philadelphia concern, and since the change made a year ago he has been seen in some of the best and most popular of the Royal and Komic photoplay productions.

EDISON COMPANY TO BERMUDA.

Director George Lessey sailed for Bermuda on the Arcadian, Saturday, April 4, with Ben Wilson, May Abbey, Mr. and Mrs. Bechtel and John Sturgeon. Several weeks will be spent on the island in making productions which only the beauties of Bermudian scenery make possible. This is the third season that the Edison players have been sent to Bermuda, where they have made many notable productions, among them "The Relief of Lucknow," which is still being exhibited although nearly two years old.

The Biophone.

First Introduction in America of a Foreign Talking Picture Apparatus Heretofore Excluded by Patent Laws.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

IN New York, on March 27, there was a private demonstration of the Biophone, a talking picture device known in Germany and other parts of Europe as the Messters Biophone, but which will be marketed in America as the Kaufmann-Kelly Biophone.

The Biophone as a mechanism is simply another proof that it is possible to synchronize a phonograph with motion pictures. To my knowledge this result has been perfectly accomplished in four different ways, with two or three others yet to be heard from. None of these four devices, however, has so far eliminated the hollow sound of the phonograph, nor has any one of them succeeded in automatically making a phonograph keep time with a patched reel. The nearest approach to such a result that these devices make is in having an arrangement by which it is possible for the operator to speed up or slow down his projection machine to agree with the phonograph.

They all arrive at the great barrier by different ways; some of the ways are simple and some are complicated, but they do arrive at a barrier. This barrier is the phonograph itself. The matter of keeping a patched reel in time with a phonograph is not so much to worry about. But the phonograph is the factor in talking pictures that must come in for some of the scientific attention that has been lavished on synchronization if ever the idea is to develop into a great popular success. Something has got to be done to eliminate the obviousness of the phonograph. Its lack of resonance, its catarrhal articulation, its scraping and its lack of distinctness are faults that seem to be magnified when the phonograph is used in connection with moving pictures.

Apparently no great effort has been made to improve this condition, but until something is done the public will probably remain fickle to talking pictures. They will listen to the phonograph in their own homes for hours, but they do not seem able to stand for its shortcomings in the theater. Add to this the poor subject matter that is usually served up in talking pictures and it is not difficult to figure out why they have not lived up to the early promises of a grand idea.

From a mechanical point of view the Biophone is more simple than some of the other devices now on the market, and it is easily the most ingenious of the lot. It is the only one of them that makes use of flexible spring transmission. Referring to the illustration, the synchronization takes place inside a metal box resembling a small meter, indicated by "A." In the demonstration I saw, this box was set in an upright position on the operating room just in front of the projector. In this illustration it is seen lying on its back on a shelf in front of the projector.

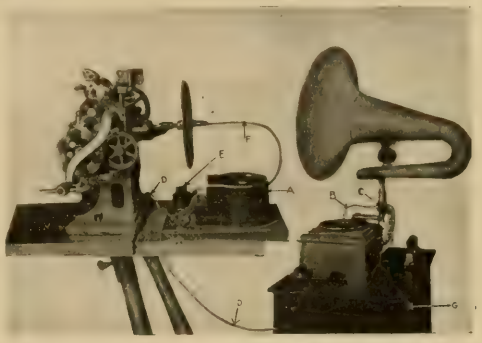
The interior mechanism of this box resembles clockwork in appearance, but differs from it in that it has no springs. It is simply a number of small gears that bring two opposing movements into the proper ratio. There are two opposing forces within this case. One is a positive force furnished by electric batteries which revolves its half of the gears in a forward direction. The other force is the operator's arm which revolves the other set of gears in a backward direction. These two sets of gears meet at a right angle by means of two small bevel gears. They are always in unison so far as the sprocket teeth are concerned; it is merely a question of the stronger force pulling all the gears in the direction it wants to go. To put it another way, the phonograph side of the gearing starts to run away with the machine side until the arm of the operator, via the crank, sets up a resistance by pulling in the other direction.

The phonograph side of the synchronizing gears gets its momentum and tempo from the phonograph by electrical relay or commutator. The first step in this transmission is at the central pin of the phonograph. A flexible shaft (B) is connected to the central pin at its one end and to the commutator (C) at its other end. This flexible shaft is exactly the same wriggling, serpentine thing that turns the drill for the dentist when he bores into your poor sensitive tooth. The spiral shaft turns as the disk revolves, and as it revolves it turns the commutator at its other end.

The commutator has six segments, that is, it makes and breaks six separate electric currents one after the other, and repeats indefinitely. These six currents are very simply transferred over six different wires (D) (D) to six corresponding magnets in the synchronizer. These six magnets in the synchronizer working in turn pull the gears around in one direction on the phonograph side. The theory of it all is that if the opposing power of the operator is applied, the magnets have to let go of the gears. In other words the gears are brought to a standstill, or a deadlock, while the magnets go on around without having any effect.

On the front of the synchronizer case is a pointer and dial. If the phonograph disc is revolving without any resistance from the operator the pointer will travel around to the right and all the inside gears will be working in that direction. If the operator is revolving his crank and the phonograph current is turned off (by snap switch E), the pointer will travel to the left and all the inside gears will be working in that direction. But when the phonograph and operator are working against each other the gears are deadlocked and the pointer remains upright at a certain mark, where it must be kept. If the pointer begins to move away from the mark it is a sign that the two sides are getting out of time and it is a signal to the operator to speed up or slow down according to which direction the pointer is trying to go.

The power from the operator's arm is transmitted in the same way as the power is transmitted at the phonograph disk. A flexible shaft (F) connects from the outside shutter shaft on the projector to the operator's side of the synchronizing gears. It is made to turn in the opposite direction from the phonograph gears—hence the opposition and the deadlock.



The current for the commutator action is supplied by ordinary dry batteries. The branch off from the main cable is shown at (G) and carries the current from the batteries. This current is controlled by the operator. By breaking the circuit at snap switch E the phonograph cannot start until the operator is ready. He controls the entire outfit from his end and is the only skilled hand needed for the working of it; anyone who knows enough to operate a home phonograph may handle the screen end of the apparatus.

There is nothing about the working of the outfit that would puzzle a competent operator for more than a few minutes. At this demonstration the operating was done by Charles B. Kearney, one of the regular stage electricians at the Century Theater. The Biophone had been there only a couple of days and he seemed to understand it perfectly.

In the illustration, behind the phonograph, is a triple Hubbel socket with two incandescent lamps and a wire running from the third socket into the phonograph. This triple socket is no part of the outfit but is part of the theater equipment used for temporary light and to drive the fan motor inside the phonograph. Mr. E. H. Kaufmann has done considerable experimenting with the phonograph and has devised a compressed air system to create an air current and carry the sound out on it through the horn.

The signals back and forth are given by ordinary buzzer. There is also a telephone which is seen lying beside the phonograph on the table.

For compactness and durability the Biophone excels any synchronizing device that has been reviewed in these columns. There are no delicate parts to get out of order. Excluding the phonograph, the whole thing can be put into a suit case, and is stong and simple enough to stand some pretty rough handling in a baggage car. Mechanically it is as good as can be expected.

There is one very puzzling thing in talking pictures. In the straight dramatic work no star, from Bernhardt down, has been considered too great to be engaged to appear before the camera. The question is: Why do not some of the talking picture people engage Caruso and other prominent opera singers and pack the houses with such subjects instead of turning out the piffling subjects as have invariably been offered? A simple song by Schumann-Heink would crowd the theaters where now the audiences flee from canned minstrel shows and small time vaudeville acts.

Doings at Los Angeles

FRED MACE, the funny man who made Apollo films, the genial president of the Photoplayers, and all around good fellow, has left the old stand and has started in business for himself. He will open on the 6th of April in his own studio, the Majestic. He has leased the old studios and will gather a star company of his own. He has not yet decided who will be in his new company, but promises some surprises all around.

* * *

Eddie Dillon, another comedian well known in Mutual circles, has gone back to Majestic, and will release Apollo films. His work will be done at the Majestic headquarters, in the old Reliance studios in Hollywood.

* * *

Another generous deluge here has put a quietus on the exposure of film. No one is taking a picture, and the signs are favorable for at least three days of rain.

James Kirkwood, who has been directing in the D. W. Griffith section of the Mutual company has moved over to the Famous Players, where he will direct.

* * *

Hobart Bosworth and the Jack London company have returned from Truckee, Northern California, where they did all the exterior scenes for "Smoke Bellew," "Odessy of the North," and "Burning Daylight. Next week the players will start work on the interiors which will be made at the Norbig studios, in Edendale.

* * *

The General Film Company has moved to its new location, an entire floor of a new Broadway building. The new offices are up-to-the-minute in every respect, and the facilities for handling thousands of feet of film a day, are ideal. The old offices, formerly occupied by Clune's, and for some time held by the G. F., were far too small.

Burton King, managing director of the Usona studio, in Glendale, and who will soon have for release some novel films, has been quite busy lately making trips to the high Sierras. He is planning a trip to wonderful Lake Tahoe as soon as the weather is perfect, and the roads in condition.

Santa Monica Vitagraph players were given a surprise when many notices were received that two weeks were left in which salaries would be paid. Those who were notified were William D. Taylor, Myrtle Gonzalez, Karl Formes, Jr., Daisy Smith, scenarioist; Miss Kendrick, cashier and secretary; Mrs. McAllister, of the film department, and several members of the stage end. The decisions of the player folk as to new locations have not been made.

George C. Stanley, leading and character man who has been seen in so many popular Vitagraph releases, has permanently left that company at Santa Monica. He quit this week and has signed up with Universal as a director. George has sold his beach bungalow and, together with his wife and "Shep," his full-blooded Collie dog, will move to Hollywood, near the Universal plant.

"Atmosphere" and local color were the cause of the arrest here of a pretty woman, Mrs. E. H. Buente. She writes scenarios and had gone into two stores shoplifting to feel how it was to be a crook. She and her sister, Miss Edith Merrifield, had decided to test their nerves and so they sallied forth and landed in Central Station with a detective who had seen them take two waists and a hand-bag. They proved their identity and were glad to be allowed to go home.

The Oz Film Company has filed articles of incorporation for $100,000. L. Frank Baum is heading the new concern, which will do all of the fairy tales from the pen of his own hand. Louis Gottschalk, the musical composer, will put the film works to music for the many theaters to use. After the 28 books of fairy stories have been done, "The Tik Tok Man," "Wizard of Oz," and other stories of his will in turn be screened. No definite location has yet been chosen, but a large site in the Santa Monica mountains is under consideration.

Frank Montgomery is surely doing the Indian pictures right. He buys the bankrupt stock of curio firms, makes friends with tramp Mexicans and has them for guards; but the latest is a papoose addition to Chief Phillips's family. The Chief is quite elated, this being the third kiddie to be presented to his family tribe. No more faking an Indian family—all real papooses now.

The South will eventually be the motion picture center of the world, say some people. Mrs. D. L. It is said the company which she represents is to come south and establish a big plant.

GEORGE BEBAN IN PICTURES.

George Beban, whose vaudeville sketch, "The Sign of the Rose," has served to bring him into considerable prominence in the theatrical world during the past few years, says that he is about to produce it in motion pictures. Mr. Beban has had several offers for the sketch from established companies, but has decided to produce it with his own company which is now in process of organization.

Wharton Incorporated

The Well-Known Producing Brothers, Theodore and Leopold Wharton, To Establish a Studio at Ithaca, N. Y.

By Hugh Hoffman.

IT WAS Theodore W. Wharton who discovered Ithaca, New York, and put it on the map as a motion picture city. He could have gone to Florida or California, but he believes that in Ithaca he has found a location superior to either. This is, of course, very flattering to the little city at the lower end of Cayuga Lake, all of which is duly appreciated by the inhabitants thereof.

Theodore W. Wharton.

For many years Ithaca has been noteworthy principally as the home of Cornell University, which institution has always been a source of pride to every Ithacan. But now the pride of Ithaca is to be divided, for its scenic charms are about to vie with the fame of Cornell in the eyes of the world. Ithaca is agog over the fact that the motion picture studios of Wharton, Inc., are to be located there as a permanent institution, which will rival Cornell in spreading afar the name of the fair city.

Wharton, Incorporated, is to be a close corporation consisting principally of the brothers Wharton, Theodore and Leopold, both men of long and rare experience in the theatrical business and in motion pictures. But it is quite probable that there would never have been any such thing as Wharton, Inc., had not Theodore accidentally discovered Ithaca and thereby discovered himself. It was in the fall of 1912 that he went there for the Essanay Company, of Chicago, to produce an incidental football picture. What he saw while there convinced him that Ithaca was to be his home for years to come, and that as a moving picture producer he would never care to be anywhere else. He induced Essanay to send a company, under his direction, to Ithaca during the summer of 1913, and the results were remarkably good. Seeing no prospects of returning there for Essanay in 1914, he severed his connection with that concern and laid his plans for Wharton, Inc.

Leopold D. Wharton.

The Whartons were received with open arms by the business men of Ithaca and were practically given the keys to the city. The whole town is behind the project in spirit and much assistance has been given by the Business Men's Association, the Industrial Commission, the Cornell University administration and faculty, as well as by influential individual citizens.

The actual production will begin May 1st, using the great glass ball cage of Cornell University as a temporary studio. Ground for a permanent studio and factory will be broken July 1st. The company starts on a strong financial basis and will produce feature pictures of five and six reels. The actual work of production will be done by the Wharton Brothers, and the product will be marketed by Pathe Freres.

Theodore Wharton has been connected with the amusement business in some way ever since he first carried water for a circus when a boy. He is a native of Milwaukee, but was raised in Texas. For nine years he was treasurer of the Dallas Opera House, after which he joined the Hopkins Grand Opera Company in St. Louis in 1895, as utility actor, and remained two seasons. The season of 1897 found him with E. H. Sothern. His next engagement was with "The Sporting Duchess," after which he was transferred to Charles Frohman's Empire Theater Company, which, at that time was notable for the number of future stars among its number. In 1889 he joined Augustin Daly's famous stock company. After Mr. Daly's death he managed "The Great Ruby," following which he became assistant treasurer of Hammerstein's Victoria Theater for five years, and later managed Hanlon Brothers' "Superba."

He was first attracted by motion pictures in 1907 when he began writing scenarios. He sold twenty-eight of his first thirty scripts to the Edison Company, which company soon made him its scenario editor and studio supervisor. The next year he joined the Kalem Company and established its first indoor studio. When Pathe Freres started their American studio he became their first director. In 1911 he went to Essanay, which was his last engagement before establishing Wharton, Inc. His last picture for Essanay was the big historical production of "The Wars for Civilization in America," picturing the great Indian uprisings of a generation ago and including in the cast such illustrious men as Generals Miles, Baldwin, Lee, King and Maus, Colonel Sickles and Buffalo Bill.

Leopold Wharton goes back twenty-two years in the amusement business. In that time he has been associated as an actor with Augustin Daly, Olga Nethersole, Klaw & Erlanger, Henrietta Crossman, and others. Eight years ago he retired from the stage and became a real estate operator in New York. Four years after that his brother Theodore induced him to play the part of Lincoln in a single Pathe production. He found the atmosphere of the studio so congenial that he has been with Pathe ever since, first as an actor and afterwards as a director.

MISS CLARA WILLIAMS.

IT has been the good fortune of the New York Motion Picture Corporation to secure for its leading women some of the most beautiful of the sex. The latest addition to that company's already attractive galaxy is Miss Clara Williams, who is appearing in the various producing companies under the direction of Tom Ince and Max Sennet, at Los Angeles. Miss Williams was born in Seattle, Wash., and is a dictinct product of the West. She is described as being twenty-two years of age, very beautiful, with large soulful eyes, and dark hair, being of the Spanish type. Some suggestion of the grace and chicness of Miss Williams is given by the accompanying engraving; more of those possessions are revealed in the pictures in which she appears, and they are well worth seeing because she is in them.

Clara Williams.

Miss Williams comes into her own as a motion picture star after a varied experience in dramatic stock, vaudeville, at the head of her own company and a preliminary experience with the Essanay and Lubin players. She has been with the Kay-Bee organization for nearly eight months and has taken many prominent roles in the pictures of that company released under its various brands. One part taken by her was that of a young lady in the first part of the production called "The Judgment," but in the latter scenes of the same picture she represented a woman of seventy-three years, which gives one some idea of her versatility. She played leads in most of all of the "K. B." Irish pictures and has had important parts in other productions. The New York Motion Picture Corporation now has a series of Spanish pictures under way in which Miss Williams is being featured. Indeed, she promises to be one of the popular picture stars in the day.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

A WELL-KNOWN Western producer of motion picture plays stated in a recent newspaper interview that surprising changes have been wrought in the personal character of professional people by the development of motion pictures; that their new line of work shows them to be the same as ordinary mortals in domestic tastes and tendencies, and the public is grossly misinformed regarding the players in this respect. All of which is very true. The interview was the subject of discussion at a rendezvous of players a few nights ago, during which many of the players spoke quite freely on the prying of the public into the personal affairs of professionals.

One of them, an old time professional, admitted that apparently there has been a great change in favor of the players; but with a full knowledge of all the circumstances the change does not appear to one so striking in character as to warrant a declaration that there has been a great reform. It has always been difficult to convince most people not identified with the theatrical business that it was possible for an actor and his wife to be widely separated for a season at a time and still preserve their domestic felicity. The fact that one went West with a company and the other remained East with another was also a signal for the gossips to start in, through pure curiosity, to find out why Mr. and Mrs. A were not together any more "and they were such a charming and lovable couple." The exigencies of theatrical life never received consideration. When, occasionally, some domestic difference arose and the greedy reporters and correspondents gave prominence to the misunderstanding the entire profession fell under the ban, so that but few theatrical people were considered suitable for recognition off the stage. "All this was due to ignorance of conditions," said the old timer.

"There has been a great change," the actor continued, "but the natures of the people have not been altered by the motion pictures. It has been a change of conditions. A new field has been opened to enable actors and their wives and families to make their homes and live together in certain communities. They have been able to become acquainted with their neighbors and show they are, after all, human beings and enjoy domestic life and happiness as well as other people. It hurts the professionals who have entered the new field to have the motion pictures credited with being the agency of their personal reformation."

Another actor present was not inclined to take the matter as seriously as the other had. "Why worry?" he asked. "It is only a penalty we all must pay for prominence we attain, whether it be on the stage, or in pictures. I agree with you that there has been a change, but there is more gossip about the private lives of moving picture players than there was about the people on the stage. There is no more occasion for it, but it has been brought about by conditions, as you term it. Nothing affords the man or woman not connected with the business more delight than an opportunity to get a group of listening acquaintances into whose ears he or she may pour his knowledge of and intimacy with players. How or where they get their information is a mystery. I have heard from strangers more about myself than I ever heard or knew of before. But it never bothers me. It is one of the necessary evils of life."

When one compares environments of the stage with those of the motion picture field the source of information or supposed knowledge of the private life of picture players outsiders convey does not appear so mysterious after all. In the first place the exclusiveness that marked stage life has been reduced almost to a minimum. One of the causes for this has been a spirit of commercialism that was not required in the stage field. In former days managers were opposed to players forming intimate acquaintance with the outside world, unless for exceptional reasons it was considered good policy to form certain society and financial alliances. In the motion picture sphere intimacy became an element of the business. The players who were the first to advance in popularity were those who favored the patrons with their photos and autographs, and permitted personal introductions. Exhibitors soon realized that the pictures most favored by their patrons were those in which the people who helped promote the intimacy appeared. Then came the personal appearance of the players at the houses. Every hand-clasp meant a life-long friend to the player and a steady patron for the exhibitor. All this made the patron an encyclopedia of the lives of all players introduced and a fund of information was always on tap for the patron's friends.

Another source of information is the studio visit. Compare the number of people allowed behind the scenes on a stage to the number that visit studios and another striking instance of the absence of seclusion is presented. With the quizzing indulged in by at least eighty per cent. of the visitors, backed up by healthy imaginations, all privacy is completely blasted. A lady who has attained great prominence as a picture player said the other day: "I would prefer the ordeal of a severe cross-examination in court to some meetings I have with visitors. They get my goat, but I must be civil."

But probably the greatest news agency in the field is composed of people who, through influence, have been able to get what is called extra work in the studios. As soon as they get a costume on they strut about like a spirited peacock and at once assume the garb of a professional, which character they maintain upon return to their friends. Of course, to emphasize their importance (?) they assume intimacy with all the notable players that gives a color of plausibility to all they say concerning their private lives.

And, yet, there are players who are responsible for much that is said about the profession. Those who are unduly susceptible to the attentions of the outside world, or thoughtless in their desires for notoriety. One of the most foolish press agent tactics is to boast of personal expenditures for wearing apparel or costumes, which has been indulged in quite often recently. For instance, there is no sense in a motion picture actress boasting that she spent several hundred dollars for a dress worn in a certain photoplay. In the first place, it is a hackneyed trick of the stage and is entirely misplaced. There is a vast difference between wearing an elaborate gown on the stage and displaying one in a moving picture. In a recent production of a ballroom scene there were a number of most beautiful gowns before the camera, and not one of them cost over forty dollars. Time can be spent to much better advantage in perfecting action and general appearance, particularly when all up-to-date costume rooms are so well stocked.

Here is a story from life of how a player tried to impress upon his friends the importance of his part in a certain picture. One day, when two of his acquaintances who had criticized his own work in the picture were seated convenient to the desk of the club room, he approached the clerk and asked for his mail. The clerk said there was no letters, but handed him a package of considerable size received by parcel post. The player expressed surprise. "I wonder what this can be," said he, as he proceeded to open the package. It contained a beautiful ornament and with it was a note expressing a young lady's enthusiasm over the manner in which the player had portrayed his part in the picture of which he had boasted. Turning to the two acquaintances, and handing them the package and note, the young man said, "There, look them over and see what disinterested people think of what we were talking about. Isn't that encouragement for a fellow?" Beaming with enthusiasm the player hurried away to show the gift and letter to others.

"He certainly has one on us," remarked one of the acquaintances. "We'll never be able to hold him down now."

"Y-a-a-s," said the other, with a yawn. "It looks that way, but you haven't got the answer."

"What is the answer?" asked the first speaker, with some curiosity.

"You notice how surprised he appeared to be when the clerk handed him the box, didn't you? Well, when we were at lunch the day before yesterday he told me he had received that identical ornament and letter that morning and described them to me. It seems to me he mailed that box himself. He's a bad actor. Forgets his lines."

NEW GAUMONT MANAGER FOR LONDON.

Frank E. Balladur, who has been located at the New York office of the Gaumont Company, has been transferred to London and will act as European representative, traveling between London and Paris. Mr. Balladur is in the market for first class comedy negatives and three- or four-reel features. This looks like a good opening.

Program Lines.

THROUGH the courtesy of W. H. Swanson (yes, that's Bill Swanson dressed up), we have come up with this clipping from the St. Louis Times. Read it:

We are not sure that we have found another reason for the universal popularity of the moving picture show, but we believe we may have done so.

The program supplied by one of the local theaters this week contains a line to the effect that "Blank's Cigarettes Are Used Exclusively at This Performance."

The evolution of the American stage has been almost bewildering in many ways. It is not so long ago that theater programs were confined to unadorned announcements of the title of the play and the names of the players. Small handbills were then in vogue.

But little by little the theater program has grown. It has become a sort of book, dealing with theatrical matters generally. Sometimes there are collections of anecdotes. There are skilled advertisements. And as an elaboration of the news touching the production on view we have learned to expect to be told that the costumes in use were designed by So-and-So, and that the wigs were supplied by somebody else, and that the scenes were painted in this or that studio.

We took kindly to these somewhat inconsequential matters, though we never regarded the wig and the costume as meriting equal mention with the names of great players and playwrights.

But we are fairly aghast at the idea of giving the cigarette its place with the wigs and the costumes and the painted castles. We are scarcely resigned to the cigarette itself on the stage—though it has been years since poor Della Fox, singing in "Wang," removed a cigarette and blew a cloud of smoke from her nostrils and intoned that memorable, naughty song—"A Summer Night."

We cannot help pausing in the presence of the honored cigarette. Shall we, in future performances of "Ten Nights in a Barroom," find that "Blank's whisky is used exclusively in this performance," or in the next presentation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" that "Blank's kennels supplied the hounds engaged in this production," or in the next rustic drama with the third act laid in a country store that Blank's hams and bacons are used exclusively in this act?"

We like to progress. We even like to move rapidly. But in some of the developments in the legitimate theater we feel that we are being shoved.

This would have no particular bearing on the motion picture business were it not that there is a growing tendency to similarly muss of photoplay programs. In place of wigs and shoes and tights we get the news that the house is perfumed with "Skunkorium," that the vacuum cleaner is from Jones & Smith and similar vital statistics.

In some few places advertisements are being run into the program space proper and we see that on Thursday the feature will be "The Little Lost Child" with a foot-note to the effect that she would not have been lost had her father smoked Tightrope Stogies or had mother fed her on Bings' Beefsteaks.

Outside advertising is all right in a program if it is off by itself, but do not forget to first make the program work for you and then for the other fellow. The habit is just beginning. Break yourself of it before it is too late.

Just Starting.

The Majestic Theater, Bloomfield, Iowa, sends in the first issue of a weekly, a small four pager, and wants to know how to build it up. In the first place they want to make the program work for them. They do not print a very large page, the type page being only four by six inches. Three of the four pages are given to a ten point reprint of Elbert Hubbard on the pictures, which is interesting but which might better be replaced by house talk. The house has just changed over to the Mutual program. It announces that fact and gives the program for one night all on one page, which also has to carry the heading. It gives a list of the brands and a few names of players. There is a lot more than that to be said about the Mutual and this would have been more interesting to the people who are unfamiliar with the Mutual brands than the Hubbard chat. They are paying quite a sum of money, for example, to David Griffith, who made the Biograph pictures. The fact that he is going to stage some of the pictures to be shown at the house is infinitely more interesting than Mr. Hubbard's opinion of the pictures. There might be something said about the various studios of the companies working under the Mutual clock, something more than the players' names might be given, more than a single day's program should have been run.

If they did not want to write their own copy Phil Mindil, the Mutual publicity man, is turning out real newspaper stuff by the column all cut up into neat paragraphs that will make a nice fit. There are cuts to be had, as well, gossip of coming films. Here, at the very day of the change, the most important day of all, about the best the house has to say for the Mutual is that it has spent thousands of dollars advertising the films. It would have been better to have said that they were spending other thousands in making the films. It is announced that later on the full program will be given, which will help some.

It would be well, first of all, to set the matter two columns to the page. The lines are too long to be read with ease. Set out the first page for house chat, coming films, improvements that increase the comfort of the spectators, notes about projection, the orchestra, the house staff or anything of that sort.

The second page could be given to gossip of the players and coming films, perhaps some brief synopsis of the more important titles and company press matter.

The third page should be given to the full program for the week neatly displayed with uniform type. The back page can continue the reading matter or announce the coming multiple reel features if these are used. There probably would be room for four one-inch advertisements of local tradesmen, two at the top and two at the bottom of the house matter. If the house matter is advertising it should be framed in with three point rule. If it is reading matter it will care for itself.

With a type page that size care should be taken not to use too large a type face for any line; not larger than a twelve-point, and the face used to head items should be the same size as the body type but a full face. Then it will be something that people will ask for. Anything is a starter and we have seen much worse starters, but we think that this publication will show improvement quickly.

No!

An exhibitor writes that he sells a number of copies of the Moving Picture Story Magazine. On the gallery of players he rubber stamps the statement that the player is to be seen only at his houses. On the Licensed stories he similarly announces that the story can be seen at his theatres. He wants to know what we think of the scheme. We think it takes a pretty cold nerve to blear the copy all up and then sell it for fifteen cents. If he gave the copies away he would be doing some regular advertising, but he sells them, and the purchaser is entitled to a clean copy. Even if the audience seems to stand for the imposition, we believe that the ultimate effect is bad as suggesting his contempt for the rights of his patrons. Possibly this is not what he thought we would think, but this is what we do think. A neat announcement on heavy paper to the effect that all licensed players and stories shown could be seen at his house is one thing. A rubber stamp used on fifteen or twenty pages is something else. Many persons want to take the portraits out of the magazine to hang up and they don't want pink stamps all over them, and no one likes a mussed copy. It would be better to change over to the printed slip. Few of those who object will voice their objections, but they will object none the less.

Used Lions.

The Jefferson Theater, St. Augustine, used real lions to advertise "Quo Vadis?" The answer is that there is a small circus wintering there, the animals being rented to a film company in the making of plays. Few managers are able to borrow a couple of lions for a day or so, but this seems to be a good chance to use S. A. Arnold's device. It will be remembered that Mr. Arnold built a fake cage and put a boy in it with a tin can in the head of which was a bit of catgut. Pulling a rosined cloth down the gut gave a noise that a trap drummer calls a "lion roar." Get a couple of the big sheets that show the lions entering the arena, get the small boy with his noise producer inside and start out.

Anything new will win attention once. Anything that makes a noise is better than something that doesn't, but don't use the same thing too often or it will go stale.

Celebrating.

The Spotlight, the New Orleans program of the Fichtenberg enterprises, is a year old and marks that event with a modest brag and a unique cover design; the calendar pages for 1913 and 1914 that mark their year, the centre being broken open to show the Mutual Girl—with Fichtenberg trailing around California with Carl Laemmle, too. We still think they could dispense with their humor page and use it better for house talk, but it is a good little sheet and we hope to see many more anniversary editions.

Another Celebration.

The New Family theater, Adrian, Mich., has been having a celebration with features every day and a program that looks better on the outside than inside. The cover is nicely designed and printed, but the twelve inside pages lack orderly arrangement. It is hard to tell the house matter from the foreign advertising and none of it is presented in such a fashion as to catch and hold attention.

Some of the announcements are in advertisement form and some part advertisement and part reading notice. Some form should have been decided upon that all of the program announcements might have been made uniform, and then these pages should have been moved over to the right hand side where they would have attracted more attention. The right hand page is always the more valuable and should carry the most important matter, in this case the programs, since, first of all, this is a program. The general matter will be read on the left hand pages, but where the programs are to the left and do not look like programs, there is a tendency to skip these and so the immediate value of the book is lost. This change and a little more reading matter would have made for a much better impression.

Why Not.

The New Grand Amusement Company, Portland, Oregon, wants to know of some good street sign that can be moved about quickly and at small expense. Why not try the motorcycle trailer that has been spoken of lately, or any of the other street stunts? If they have no file of back numbers they should arrange to keep such a file instead of letting the copies kick around loose. If we had a theater we would no more think of running without a file of this paper than without a ticket seller. Back numbers bound in volumes of three months each may be had for $1.50 a volume.

Used a Trailer.

A correspondent who has forgotten to sign his name, but who is with the Shephard's Photoplay Shows, Valley, Wash., writes that he is making a circuit of six towns a week, running six reels of 60 day stuff for ten and twenty-five cents. He tried the scheme of giving a free admission to all pupils who had an average of 85% or better in their studies, but some of the parents made the astonishing objection that their children would lie and steal to obtain the coveted cards. It would seem that there was something wrong with the children rather than the scheme, but the plan was given up in those towns where the objection was made.

The writer has also used the trailer scheme recently sent in by West Point, Ga., but he used an ordinary bicycle with two old bicycle wheels for a trailer, a sufficiently light device to be operated by man power. Generally the rider was in some eccentric make-up to add to the effect. It is not easy to get advertising devices in the small towns, but a traveling show can easily carry a bicycle and the extra frame knocked down, or the frame alone would be sufficient.

A Business Getter.

M. R. Edgar writes that he has taken over the Ritz Theater, Toronto, a house that had been sold out by the sheriff, and in three weeks has brought his average up to $38, running nights only. This looks like getting the business in a hurry. It is not easy to win back patronage after people have gotten out of the habit of going to a certain house, but it can be done by adroit management.

Mr. Edgar is using a card folder for a weekly program and explains that he means to run a cut of a different photoplayer each week. If he will get a fine screen cut instead of the newspaper stuff most companies supply, he will get a program that will be kept and a collection will form a permanent advertisement if he will print the name and address of the house not too conspicuously on the front page. He uses a fine grade of card, and a 60 screen cut would print very poorly. He merely announces a three-reel subject for each change and mention the music. It would pay him to use the back page for a series of chats framed with the idea of making his patrons personal friends of the theater. From a hundred to a hundred and fifty words a week could be made very effective. He is using a ready printed card this first issue. When the players' cuts are used it will pay to print both sides and get the house imprint on the first cover page. It will add a little to the cost, but much more to the effect.

Just Starting.

B. C. Bell, of the Gem Picture Palace, Palestine, Texas, sends in his first program and wants to know how to make it better.

The first step would be to slaughter and bury whoever read proof of the first issue, but that is almost to be expected of a first issue, and later it is probable that someone for the house will read up on the printer and get it right. The issue is eight pages and cover, three of the cover pages being given over to foreign advertising.

One paragraph speaks of a blank being inclosed for the benefit of those who wish the issue to be mailed to them. It would be better to print this blank on the last page of the program proper (not the cover) and call attention to it on several of the other pages. This very slight formality of filling out the blank takes the curse off the free distribution and makes it something to be respected, because it requires a little trouble to get.

The cover page is not very striking. The date, volume and serial number should rise to the top of the sheet below the head, being cut off from the title by one point rule. It now lies at the bottom. The title, "The Gem Weekly," is all right as it stands, but the underline, "published for our patrons," should not be larger than ten-point that it may not detract from the more important line. A better underline would be, "Published at Palestine, Texas, every Monday (or whatever the day may be) for the benefit of all picture lovers." That should make two lines in eight-point across the page. A rather dirty cut of King Baggot is the illustration. Either a better cut (which is merely better press work) should be used or the illustration should be dropped. A poor cut is worse than none at all, and a neat display leader is better than a libelous likeness.

The first reading page announces some of the coming attractions as ABSINTHE, Universal (Imp)
King Baggot and Leah Baird, four-reel feature.

If you will turn over the page to the start of the program by days you will see that this is on Monday, but this should not be made necessary. Say:

"ABSINTHE"—A four-reel Universal (Imp) feature, with King Baggot and Leah Baird. (Monday, March 16th.)

In that way the entire announcement is complete and if you only glance at that one page you know all about it. This applies to all of the features, which are pulled up from the regular program for a front page display. On the succeeding pages the programs by days are given, but not a word as to the date, and yet this is one of the most important points. Always date the day.

Don't Use All Caps.

There is a tendency to use too much matter in all capitals, as in the subheads to the daily program. Three or four lines in all capitals cannot be read with ease and so will be skipped. Put it in full-face lower case and the line will be read. Look at these two paragraphs:

KING BAGGOT ESSAYS GREATEST ROLE OF CAREER IN "ABSINTHE." UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURE.

King Baggot Essays Greatest Role of Career in "Absinthe." Universal Special Feature.

It will be seen that the lower case is easier on the eyes.

In some cases the title appears above the subhead and in others below. A uniform scheme of make-up should be adopted and adhered to. Nothing looks worse than a go-as-you-please make up. Here titles may be in caps or lower case and anywhere from ten to twenty-four point. Some pages are broken with heads and others run no heads at all. If Mr. Bell will hold a long session with the printer and insist on uniform style he will get it, and be pleased with what he gets.

In passing we think he will like it better if he puts the week's programs in straight program form with the descriptive matter across page in six-point instead of trying to make running stories. Make the program pages the righ hand and give more or less "pure reading matter" on the left hand pages. This will give him his page one for editorial matter and three program pages, with two days to the page. It will make a far more attractive publication and the additional cost of the six-point composition will not be a serious matter.

In this case the program pages should be framed in rule work (not fancy border) the best being a three-point rule. Once these rules are cut the additional expense will be trifling. An orderly arrangement would be at the top, and middle the name of the day, as "Monday" or whatever it is. This in twenty-four point. To the right of this run in 10-point the date, thus:

Monday April Thirteenth

Now in a good bold twelve-point run the title of the picture at the left and follow with an eight-point name of the brand in brackets, thus:

Patthers (Imp)

Below this run the six or eight point descriptive matter, perhaps four to ten lines, as the subject warrants and the space permits.

On the left hand pages the general matter now following the program pages can be run in the twelve-point body type and carry the reader from page to page where, at present, the program pages may be skipped, the reader turning directly to the miscellaneous stuff.

We think the printer will understand this if Mr. Bell will take it to him. At any rate a good start has been made and there is a fine showing of advertisements.

A Gem.

O. A. Engelbrecht, of the Gem Theater, Temple, Texas, is another new program publisher. He has been using the papers with throwaways for the features. Now he is using a program. It follows the eight-page idea with a program a day and front and back pages for the house. The typographical display is good, but we would suggest a larger type for titles in place of eight-point full-face caps and an upper and lower case in place of all capitals. This applies also to the headings of the paragraphs that he runs at the bottom of each page, mostly items about the players.

One thing we note is that on the second and third pages he uses a reader (supplied by the company), to go with the cut of Carlyle Blackwell which is used on the front page. On the seventh page is another reader, this time about "Chasing the Smugglers." The fact that Mr. Blackwell made this should have been mentioned in the earlier reader, with a reference to the seventh page where the subject is announced, something such as:

> On the seventh page of this issue will be found the announcement of "Chasing the Smugglers," another notable two-reel Kalem picture produced by Mr. Blackwell and which will be shown here Saturday evening.

This following the list of recent produced plays would give the item greater value as a business bringer. Similarly the front page caption should have read, in addition to the name "Who will appear here Saturday evening in 'Chasing the Smugglers,' a stirring two-reel drama." It is catching up such points as these that gives a program real value.

On the sixth page there is a well written paragraph about the orchestra. One or two other points about the house should have been carried, though much is said in little on the back page where some points about the house and full information as to hours of performance, prices of admission and other information is given: the information that every program should carry and so few do.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Notice.

WILL those readers of this department who have obtained script criticism or who contemplate obtaining such, please note from the advertisement on another page that this offer has been withdrawn.

At no time has it been directly profitable to criticise scripts at two dollars a reel, but such criticism has been of use as a study of the trials that confront the beginner and which this writer, in his own practice, has forgotten. It seems that the close study of the efforts of a few writers, through a systematic direction of their studies, is of greater good to the department than the more or less intermittent work of anyone who elects to pay the fee, and in future criticism will be confined to the work of persons living in New York City who in consideration of free tuition are willing to work under the direction of the writer.

We believe that the department will benefit by the change, since we shall have constantly under instruction pupils of all grades of advancement and, so far as possible, of various grades of intelligence.

The scripts already in hand will be taken care of as time permits, unless the writers get tired of waiting and ask for their return. We are endeavoring to find some competent person with greater leisure to take up this work.

That League.

Because the Photoplay Authors' League has been founded by some of the leading minds in the business, and because, on the strength of these names many writers are tempted to join the League, we once more give space to the matter in this department with the promise that the League will not again be permitted to crowd out the usual copy.

We have received from Marc Edmund Jones, secretary of the League, a letter in which he suggests that we are not a "benign diety" to be able to look forward into the future and declare the future of the League. The gist of this letter may be sensed from the reply here printed. He adds that it is the purpose of the League to make the manufacturers honorary members, "obtaining contributions from them as we do so." Somehow that does not sound nicely, but we do not believe that Jones means what this sounds like. We do not believe that the League can do the slightest practical good. We give our reasons in the letter here given. This is the expression of opinion of only one man and is given for what it is worth.

We quote this paragraph from Mr. Jones' letter:

> Going back to business, you ask what we expect to give for $10.00 a year. As you say, we only expect to give a membership card. It is not what the League gives to its members, but what the members give to the League, which merely represents them in advancing their interests as a whole—the photoplay author profession at large. In the matter of copyright—that is one of the least things which the League can, and will do. Its principal work is to knit together the photoplay field as a whole; to accelerate its progress as a whole, and to this end we expect to take in manufacturers themselves as honorary members, obtaining contributions from them as we do so. As stated in its purposes, the League will not take an arbitrary stand with manufacturers, and there will not be any White-Rats' Strike or anything of that kind. Your attitude that the majority of the membership of the League will develop more faulty judgment than that demonstrated by the organizers shows a lamentable lack of faith in the photoplay authors of the country. The fact that you believe that the majority of the photoplay authors are not capable of handling their own interests is a bureaucratic stand which would unit anyone less beloved and trusted than yourself as the conductor of a photoplay writers' column. Heaven knows we all like you well enough, but we wish 'to thunder" you would come down to earth in this particular matter.

Yours of March 23th to hand. Since you write me on the letter head of the League and since you make no request to the contrary, I am going to make my reply to you do for the paper, too. You know how I loathe the sight of a typewriter.

I called it "that league of yours," because it was evidently started by the del Ruth case and because you told me that your attorneys were now your legal representatives. You are largely responsible for it, if not the inventor.

I am not a "benign dignity," but I've lived forty-two years and I've seen these things come and go in other lines and in this. I know, before it begins, what the answer is. For twenty-three years I have been playing the game, rarely and fairly, and in that time I have never had a story stolen. I have never had a run with an editor but once and then because he was slow with a check, and I have never had much trouble in being an "inside" writer in fiction as well as in photoplay, because I could and did deliver the goods, promptly and in reasonably good form. In other words, I have never, in nearly a quarter of a century, had to put up a yelp for help. I have always been able to fight my own battles and most of these have made no affair in Mexico resemble real warfare.

On the other hand, I have seen the White Rats rise and fall once and fall half way a second time. I have seen a lot of little authors' leagues go bang. I have seen one photoplay league go it's one hetter with never a tear save on the part of those who battled with a deadly weapon, ten and never, not even once, have I seen one of these things win a real victory, nor even anything approximating a victory. On the other hand, I have seen a lot of harm done and I have personally, by orders from my employers, sent back the form work of members of a certain league on the proposition that the league must be composed of people whose work was not worth while. Most of the scripts I read through curiosity bore out the statement.

As I have said, I believe that all of you founders are well meaning and of good faith, but as I have also said, I cannot see that you can make good. Until you can convince me that you can do ten dollars' worth of good to each and every contributor to your society, I shall hold the position I do. You can't get copyright and you have backed down on that. You can't make editors give your members the preference save by doing better work than others do, and you do not need a league in order to do that. You say it is what the members give the league. What do they give the league other than their annual dues? You can't knit together the photoplay writers any more than you can knit together any other body of men. The brotherhood idea is good on paper, but are you going to give up the sale of a script because to do so will help a weaker brother make a sale in your place?

It seems to me that the outside idea of the league is best illustrated by an inquiry I received the other day from a writer who wanted to know if Griffith would help her with her work if she joined the league.

Will he?

The league is a chance for the boobs to mix up with the well-known people by mail and this is about all you give and I do not see that it is worth the money.

As to the action of the general membership. Being more or less of an anarchist yourself, and not being very far beyond the time you used to curse when you hit a slump and did not sell for several weeks, you do not realize that most of the people who will join your league will be the soreheads because the others do not need you. And if you think that the original membership can hold the soreheads in check when all have equal vote, wait and see. The Board of Control can't control and the members will put the boots to the manufacturers long before they grow boots and just for that you'll all have to get off.

We freed the slaves in 1863 nad down South they still have to lynch a darkey now and then to remind the rest that in freeing the slaves it was not intended that they should ride roughshod over the rest of the nation. I do not mean to suggest that authors are the slaves of the manufacturers, but to point out that power newly acquired, or the sense of power will inevitably lead to trouble.

There is not a thing you want to do that you, individually, have not done or are not able to do individually. At the Ed-Au recently Mrs. Brandon told me that I needed a keeper, because I did not think the club should put out a seal that placed on scripts would bring us more money. She pays about $20 a real for Eclair scripts and I was just then reckoning to be raised from $25 to $35 for half-reel scripts. Who do you think needs the manager? If you can deliver the goods you can, if you work nicely and without the use of a brass band, get the price.

And now for a personal point. You say I have put myself in bad unnecessarily with a number of people. Even so. I regret the fact. You suggest that I have a responsibility in that I may guide my readers. Even so. It is that sense of responsibility that leads me to warn my readers against the league, even though it is composed mainly of those who have been my personal friends. I am gambling a well-paid job on my belief that my knowledge of affairs is steering me (and the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD) right in this matter. Perhaps I will lose and get fired from the paper. Perhaps I shall have to thank you who have sought to turn me from my evil ways, but I am honestly and firmly convinced that the Photoplay Authors' League is an evil thing, though conceived in righteousness, and so long as I have a voice I shall say so and seek to give those who look to me for advice the best advice I can, and this, at present, is that they keep out of the Photoplay Authors' League and avoid being marked down as one of the kickers.

I am strong for anything that makes for the betterment of the business, that gives the helping hand to the struggling and the word of cheer to the failing, but the club and the torch are not the helping hand, nor yet the word of cheer, and you cannot, working on the lines you do, benefit either yourselves or the lesser brothers.

I am not sore, and there is nothing I would more gladly welcome than something that would benefit the struggling writer and help him come into his own, but what you offer, what you can possibly offer, is not the remedy. Get some organization that will make the writer realize that only through hard work and not through combination or legal enactment is success possible, and I'm with you hide and hair, or at least the little hair I have, but get a society that makes authors and not anarchists if you want to sit up in the gallery and give three cheers.

I've taken a lot of time to tell you all this, because it is the last time I shall have anything to say in the matter, and I am going to print this in detail, because it is the last time I shall print anything about the league until the time comes to say, "I've told you so before." And saying "I told you so," is one of my best little specialties, or has been in the times past.

To California, Please.

Through the ambiguous wording of the item sent in, it was announced that scripts for Beauty films should be sent to Chicago. R. R. Nehls advises us that all American or Beauty scripts should be sent to the company at Santa Barbara, California.

Why?

Mrs. Brandon wants to know why it is that women are most generally the authors of the most impossible immoral pictures. We don't know. We do know that it is not a peculiarity of the photoplay business. It is the same in fiction writing.

Mrs. Brandon also writes that the Eclair Company is top price. She writes:

> A great many companies indulge in vague statements of the vast sums which they pay for scripts. I have never yet been able to substantiate these claims, although I have questioned free-lance playwrights whose contributions are considered to be the best obtainable.
> There is no company paying more than the Eclair does; and few companies who pay as promptly. We are constantly in the market for:
>
> Two-reel psychological dramas.
> Two-reel modern society dramas.
> Single reel scenarios for our companies of juveniles.
> Single and double-reel scenarios for our Western companies, operating in Arizona.
> These must contain heart interest or punch—or better yet—both, judiciously bound together by unusual situations that will fit our leads and can be contrived at reasonable cost.

We don't know what sort of free lances Mrs. Brandon has been talking to, but we do know that we get more for a half-reel than Mrs. Brandon at her best pays for three-reelers per reel and that we get more for one reel than Mrs. Brandon generally pays for two. Let's assist Mrs. Brandon's education. The best offer she has publicly made has been $100 for a three-reel story. If you regularly get more than $33.33 for a reel send the documentary evidence to Mrs. Brandon. Perhaps she'll raise the price. Her average price per reel seems to be about $20. She must know a funny lot of free lances.

What Universal Wants.

Monte Katterjohn announces that Universal wants two-reel stories for Miss Florence Lawrence and advises that writers watch some Lawrence-Victor releases before they try to fill the order. They can also use three-reel stories for Miss Leah Baird.

The general need of the moment is for two and three reel melodramas which can have any locale, except the "strangely foreign," to use Mr. Katterjohn's apt phrase.

One Reelers.

Six months or so ago Mr. Plimpton advanced the opinion that there would always be a market for one-reel stories, and he practiced what he preached by not neglecting Edison one-reel stories in favor of the multiples, and this at a time when most companies would buy nothing but stories in two or more parts.

Authors wrote in and wanted to know what to do as it was all they could do and get out good one-reel stories. We advised them to keep on.

In the last month there has been a sharp return to the one-reel plays and these will presently lead the demand again. Two and three reel stories will be wanted, but there will be again a general market for the thousand-foot stuff. Make a note against the time the editors begin to yell for help.

The Oakland Inquest.

The Oakland Inquest Circle is meeting twice a month, on the first and third Wednesdays, and at each session some member reads a "dead" script and the Coroner's Jury sits on it in inquest. Miss Winnifred Warner writes:

> We dangle our perfectly good play before the eyes of the Jury and wonder pathetically why the editors cannot see how good it is, and in a mighty short space of time the Jury has put its fingers on the weak places and we open our eyes and begin to see things.

This is an excellent plan for other circles to follow. Anything that leads to study is helpful and we all learn more through our mistakes than our successes.

Copyright?

Through the efforts of William Lord Wright, the Hon. Frank B. Willis is going to seek to obtain for authors the right to copyright unpublished scripts. We don't know what use it will be to them after they get it, but Mr. Wright sagely observes that they will not be happy until they get it. We do not perceive Mr. Wright asking anyone to send him ten dollars, either.

One well-known editor said the other day that so far as the company he represented was concerned, the effect of copyright would merely be to keep from sales anyone submitting copyrighted scripts, as the handling of the copyright release and registration of the assignment would be too much trouble. We think this is the way some others look at it.

Guarantees.

The newest school scheme is to guarantee the sale of one script. Thus far but two have used the idea, the original being an eastern concern that announces itself also a producing company, though they were not able to show a camera to a recent visitor and to another they explained last winter that they were going to do all outdoor work. "How about the static?" asked the inquirer, knowing what pranks static electricity plays with the film. "We don't use electricity, we take by sunlight," was the response. These people give no time limit on their guarantee and keep you sending out as long as possible. It requires a threat to appeal to the postal authorities to get a check for ten dollars and an insulting letter.

The other school is conducted by a former editor who will give you ten dollars if you do not sell your script within ninety days.

In neither case does the guarantee amount to anything. You sell one script to the teaching organization, but it does not go to production, nor is that sale any guarantee that you will sell others. They simply gamble ten dollars on your chances of being able to sell one script somewhere, and most people have one or two ideas that are good and that would be good in synopsis without technique.

Synopses Only.

Lately we quoted Lawrence S. McCloskey, of the Lubin Company, in the matter of synopses and then we had to go over and see him and he elaborated the brief-written message.

"It's a short-sighted policy," he said, "that encourages the submission of the synopsis alone. Even if the author cannot write a decent script of action, he should be made to try for his own ultimate good and the good of the business.

"The man who sells the plot alone will never become more than a literary tipster and he'll seldom tip good photoplays, because he does not know what they are. I think that we should be preparing for the even greater field that is yet to open and do our best to raise all authors up to the higher grade that will presently be demanded. It is very seldom that over here we can take a script and give it to a director as it stands. It must be touched up if not completely reconstructed, but the script of action most certainly does give you a better idea of what the author is trying to tell than any synopsis, no matter how full it may be, and at the same time the author is learning photoplay.

"If he has to scheme and contrive over his plot of action, he is going to realize that his idea will require too many leaders or that some of his scenes are not practicable, or find that the story, no matter how good it may look in synopsis, cannot be gotten over in action. We could tell that from the synopsis alone, but we want him to realize it, too; to get knowledge of what is and is not a photoplay possibility, and it is only through making him do his own work that he can ever come to this understanding.

"It might be easier to handle the synopsis alone, but the editor owes it to himself, to his employer and to the business in general to help to raise the standard of script writing and it can be done only through the actual practice the author gets in writing the full script of action. It teaches him to visualize his ideas and to recognize the difference between the possible and the impossible plot."

The man who wants to work with synopses is little more than a literary loafer and we say this knowing perfectly well that some of the well-known writers are in the habit of submitting the synopsis first. If the idea is liked they will elaborate into the full script. They should know whether or not the idea is a good one and work out only the good ideas. It sounds real faddish to submit synopses and take orders for these, but it is downright loafing and nothing else.

The only possible exception is when a story is being written to order and the author wants to know if the idea he suggests is along the right lines. Then it is proper to offer full synopses of three or four ideas to the editor and let him select the one he likes the best.

If all editors felt the same sense of responsibility to the business that Mr. McCloskey does the conditions would be vastly better, but unfortunately few of them do.

Prices.

"When I get a letter that asks how much we pay for plays," said a well-known editor the other day, "I know perfectly well that we shall never buy a play from that writer. The man who writes merely to get checks never writes a story that is worth a check."

Inquiries.

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

LOIS.—Someone caught the Biograph Identifier asleep. It was Miss Isabel Rae and not Miss Reid who was the girl in "A Bunch of Flowers." She was formerly with Pathe.

MRS. I. R. S.—We do not know the player's present whereabouts.

E. W. S.—The synopsis has nothing to do with the picture on the screen and so has no bearing on the use of leaders. If the scene in action is not explanatory, use the leader. There is no established limit as to the number of scenes per reel, but it is well not to have too many. About forty to sixty would seem to be the present usage. If you will see Kalem's "Shipwrecked" you'll see your story has been done before. We know of no company that would be particularly likely to buy a prize ring story.

H. K.—Any person who says that there is six times the demand for photoplays that there is for short stories is talking through a whole storeful of hats. The newspaper syndicates alone buy more stories per week than the film companies, not to mention the magazines and weeklies. As you suggest it is such statements as these that coax the unfit into the game and close the market to all.

ALAMEDA.—Studios do not discriminate against the outside writers. Our personal scalp list runs between two and three hundred.

J. C. B.—We have not the space for a description of trick work here. As a rule it is easier to move the man down to the camera than the camera up to the man. Whaddye mean, what became of John Bunny? We cannot give personal addresses.

W. M.—Henry Walthall was Holofernes in "Judith of Bethulia."

B. S.—The objection of the Censorship in this case would probably be based on the action rather than the intent. You have the right analysis.

C. J. H. G.—"All exit" is more generally used than "exeunt," though the latter is the correct form. Usage gives consent to the former, just as there is only one man we know of who is so painfully correct as to refer to scenarii instead of scenarios.

R. P. H.—Your question is too indefinite. It is permissible to use ten leaders in a reel if you have to. It is better not to use so many if you can possibly avoid them while keeping the action intelligible.

J. D. C.—This is easy! Sid Olcott is with the Sid Olcott International Productions. He is in Jacksonville.

Notice to Manufacturers.

IT IS an established rule of the Moving Picture World and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of the staff. In the case of apparatus having to do with projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps, will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 28.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What do you understand by "efficiency" as applied to a motor-generator set? What is considered high efficiency for such sets? Suppose you installed a d. c. economizer on 110 volt current, the machine having 67 per cent. efficiency, how would its performance compare, in economy, with resistance? Suppose the set cost $250.00, how long would it require to save its price, using an average of 35 amperes eight hours per day? Suppose the current to be 220 volt, how long would it then require?

Roll of Honor.

There were no replies to question No. 22 which I would consider as being complete and entirely correct throughout. Some of the mistakes made were surprising, particualrly as to the effect of placing resistance in series with the compounding of a compound wound generator. That particular thing was so almost childishly simple that when some men whom I personally know to be good electricians fell down on it, I was rather stumped.

Brother Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, sent in an excellent reply, a portion of which is quoted further on. L. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y., also sent in a very good reply which demonstrated the fact that he thoroughly understands the various questions. Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, also contributed a reply which was quite correct, though he overlooked one or two items. There were also fairly good replies from Seattle, Washington, (2), St. Louis, Missouri; Denver, Colorado; Boston, Massachusetts; and Chicago, Illinois, (2). W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey, again pulls down the honors as having sent in the best general reply, though I think he too was a little weak on the resistance in series with the compounding. The way he had it put he may have the right idea and did not express it fully. Also he was not quite complete on the practical difference between the motor and the generator, though his answer as to the theory of the two machines is correct and excellent. Later L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada, sent in a very excellent reply. I am sorry, but it came too late to be considered for publication. His drawings were unique in their excellence.

Answer to Question No. 22.

By W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey.

The question:

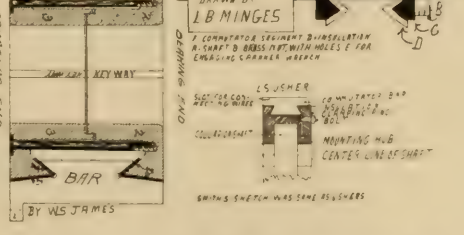
Explain in hte action (electrical) of the d. c. motor, as compared to the d. c. generator. Explain the relative effect of cutting in and cutting out resistance in series with the shunt field of a motor and a generator. What would be the effect of placing resistance in series with the compounding of a compound-wound generator? Describe and illustrate, by sketch, the method usually employed in attaching commutator bars, and explain how you would proceed if your commutator showed signs of loosening.

The answer:

A conductor carrying an electric current if placed in a magnetic field, will have a tendency to move in a certain direction, and with an amount of force proportionate to the strength and direction of the current and the direction and number of lines of force in the magnetic field; but if a conductor without current be moved across a magnetic field in the opposite direction to which it would normally travel, it cuts the line of force composing the magnetic field, and an e. m. f. is generated in the conductor which sends a current through the conductor itself. The first instance is the action of the d. c. motor, and the latter is the d. c. generator. These explanations are short, as the answer to question No. 3 gave the physical theory of the generator. If we take any d. c. generator and instead of applying some outside mechanical energy to its shaft and making it generate an e. m. f., we simply supply its terminals with an outside current, it will run as a motor. To sum up in a few words, the motor armature takes the strength of the magnetic field and the current of its own windings and changes them into mechanical energy; while the generator has mechanical energy applied to its armature windings and these turning through its own magnetic field change the mechanical energy into electrical. In the first place answering the second part of the question, it must be understood that the difference in potential (voltage) between the brushes of a shunt field dynamo, or generator, gradually decreases the current from the armature coils increases in strength. This is due to the internal resistance of the armature windings and the reaction of their currents on the field. Then if we decrease the resistance of the field circuit, as the load on the external circuit increases (which consequently increases the load on the armature) we allow more current to flow through the windings of the field, thus creating a stronger magnetic field for the armature windings to cut through, and the stronger field enables the armature to build up its potential at the brushes so as to take care of the increased external circuit. In other words "cutting out" resistance on the generator field raises the voltage across the brushes, while "cutting in" resistance has precisely the opposite effect.

In the shunt motor the resistance should not be put in series with the field for the following reason: When we close the line to the shunt motor a heavy current flows through the armature, while very little flows through the field, because the pressure (voltage) across the field terminals is only equal to the armature drop. Now if we put resistance in series with the field we choke back what little current there would be passing through the field. In this case we will either burn out the armature, on account of excessive rush of current through its coils, or, if this did not happen, we would blow the fuses or the circuit breaker. Of course if the motor is started by a starting box and all the resistance is cut out after it is up to speed the motor runs perfectly, but as we cut in resistance we weaken the current in the field coils, and consequently the magnetic field, thereby slowing the motor down. If we so weaken the magnetic field that the conductor carrying the electric current (the armature) cannot move, there will be a rush of current through the armature as previously explained.

The effect of placing resistance in series with the compounding of a compound-wound generator would be to reduce the efficiency of the compound. The compounding means to add a set of series windings, of such size that they can carry the whole amperage of the outside circuit, to the shunt windings to assist them when the load increases. As I have before stated, in other answers, the strength of the shunt field drops as the load on the machine increases, and the strength of the series field increases as the load on the machine increases. Then, the resistance in series with the series windings would retard, or hold back, the flow of current through the series field and would not let it increase enough to take care of the drop of the shunt field, thus lowering the efficiency of the generator.



As to the commutator I have drawn a sketch showing one cut lengthwise through the middle. The heavy lines indicated by "I" and arrows show the insulation between the bars and the commutator frame. The open space in the centre is where the shaft goes. The keyway is a slot into which a tapered piece of metal is driven so as to fasten the commutator frame to the shaft. Shaded portion "2-2" shows one-half of the frame, and "3-3" the other half. The projecting ends "L-L" are the ears, or lugs of the bar in which the ends of the armature windings are soldered, and the dotted lines show the depth of the slots in the ears. To loosen the bars it is only necessary to loosen the long screws. In setting the bars it is best to tie a string loosely around the commutator, then under the string place a stick and twist the stick so as to tighten the string. This will pull all the bars in evenly. After they are as tight as it is possible to get them, by this means, tighten the large screws shown in the sketch. Sometimes instead of these screws there are bolts. In the sketch I have only shown two of them, but there are, as a rule, from six to eight to the average commutator of the size the operator will come in contact with. The action of the screws is plainly shown in the sketch. A bar may be removed if the screws are backed out far enough. The insulation "I" will generally be found to be in four rings: two next to the armature and the other two next to the shaft. In the drawing these rings are shown as being cut in half. In the event of the commutator coming loose from the shaft it is only necessary to tap the key into the keyway a little further. On some machines the commutator is fastened to the shaft with a lock-nut on the shaft, the same working against the end of the commutator frame. In the event of there being a lock-nut, the heads of the large screws shown in the sketch will be found under the nut. It is then necessary to take the nut off before you can tighten the bars. I forgot to say it is best to heat the commutator before tightening it as I described, as the insulation will be softened and work easier, but don't overdo the heating; just get it good and warm.

In addition to brother James' reply I have given three sketches of the commutator fastening. One by James, one by Minges, one by Smith and one by Usher, each showing a different type of fastening.

Brother Dobson in explaining the electrical difference between the motor and the generator hits one of the things I was really after, and which I was in hopes would be enlarged upon more, since it is a rather puzzling point to many. He says:

> In a generator the cutting in of resistance in series with the shunt field will lower the voltage at the brushes and the voltage will continue to drop as more resistance is inserted, since this reduces the flow of current around the coils of the field magnets, which, in turn, reduces the magnetic density of the field and hence the e. m. f. of the generator itself. On a motor when resistance is cut in, the motor speeds up, due to the fact that the additional resistance reduces the magnetic flux, and in order to generate the same counter electro force the armature must increase its speed.

Brother Dobson also is the only man who in my opinion answered the compounding resistance question right. He says:

> The effect of resistance in series with the compounding would be a decrease in the current output. As a matter of fact if you had stopped to consider, that part of question 22 was really in the nature of a "catch," since the placing of resistance in series with the compounding would really be placing the resistance in series with the whole outside circuit and it would, of course, be an absurd, not to say an impossible proposition. Of course, as friend James says it "would reduce the efficiency of the generator." Whether he is correct or not would depend on exactly what he had in mind when he said that. It would certainly reduce the efficiency of the generator all right, because it would cut the voltage of the whole circuit. Moreover, the resistance wire would have to carry all the current of the whole outside circuit.

A late reply by L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada, is correct. He says:

> A compound-wound machine is a combination of series wound and shunt wound. It will therefore be seen that if we put the resistance in series with the series winding, the whole of the output of the generator must pass through it. The result would be the lowering of the voltage and an increase of the load, also the resistance, unless of large capacity, would burn out as the load came on. The net result would be an absolute loss of power.

Correct, brother Usher. You may take your place at the head of that particular class. There is one thing certain, none of you need be afraid to tackle these questions, because if you fall down you won't be in the lonesome class. For every Roll of Honor name there are a hundred replies that show lamentable weakness.

Size of Type.

H. W. Griggs, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, asks:

> Is there not some way of making the letters and numbers on cuts more distinct? Many of them are so small as to be almost invisible even with a reading glass. It is a pity that the print of the department is not of the same type as that used in the body or editorial columns, and that more space be allowed to this, the most important of all the departments, even if it meant the raising of the subscription price to $3.50.

No, brother Griggs, that matter has all been gone over many times. We are now allotted more than twice the space devoted to any other department. Also I, myself, agreed to the small type, in order to get all I possibly could out of the space. I try to have figures and letters on cuts large enough to be readable, but sometimes it is almost impossible; also the reduction is sometimes greater than I figured on. Correspondents sending in drawings should make their lettering large enough in proportion to the rest of the drawing to stand the reduction. I could use twice the space I have every week, but I think the management is treating us very well, and we have no very large kick coming.

Light Trouble.

H. Schaeffer, Amity, Oregon, writes:

> When I clear up my screen on the stereo lens there is a shadow on the lower half of the moving picture. I have tried every way possible to clear both fields without changing my lamp, but so far have failed. Am using an Edison Exhibition Model.

Cannot say positively what is the matter, brother Schaeffer. You stand off at a distance and look at the light ray between the condenser and aperture and see if it does not point either up or down, instead of going straight across. I think that is where your difficulty is and if so it is caused either by (a) The lamp house being too high or too low with relation to the mechanism, or, (b) the condenser, or at least the front lens of the condenser, not being square with the aperture. That is to say, the top of the lens tips either ahead or back.

Handbook Benefits Him.

W. C. Crawford, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

> Wish to thank you for the suggestions you gave me. If my screen illumination is improved it is by the direct result of following instructions given in the Handbook.

You are not the only one, brother Crawford, who has improved his work by studying the Handbook. You are entirely welcome to any suggestions I may be able to give you.

Tinting Fades.

Charles Gessley, Shenandoah, Pa., submits samples of green tinted film from which the tinting is fading away, leaving a brown sepia effect. He wants to know how the defect can be remedied.

The fading of the tinting may be due to either one or two things, viz: (a) Failure to thoroughly wash after removal from the fixing bath. (b) An excess of iron in the water used in developing the film. However, I think there is nothing that can be done. So far as I know there is no method of removing the tinting, and if it were removed the splotches of brown would still remain. You can submit the film to some manufacturer for opinion, but I think you will find the film is ruined.

Local No. 300.

Local 300, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Canada, sends in list of officers for the directory and says:

> We have been organized since July 10, 1913, having a full direct charter with forty members on our books. Projection in this town is good, thanks to the useful hints obtained from the Handbook, which many of our members take advantage of. Quite a number of the theaters have mercury arc rectifiers, and, without exception, every theater has two machines; each one has its machines wired in multiple. We have one road-show house, and two vaudeville theaters, so you see, though we are isolated from any other large city, we are well up with the times. We wish yourself and the Moving Picture World every success.

All of which needs no comment. I trust Local Union 300 will continue to prosper, and that projection in Saskatoon will be kept right up to the mark, as no doubt it will, since the union there is progressive and its members make use of the avenues of knowledge provided, instead of setting back and expending their energy howling about the "danger of the spread of knowledge."

Flicker and Blue Spot.

Henderson Photoplay Co., Henderson, Minnesota, orders a Handbook and writes:

> Have been running a new Edison Model B for about two months. Lately the picture seems to flicker more than usual, and am at a loss to understand the reason; also there is a blue spot in the center of the screen. Is this from the carbons, or the condensers or the position of the lamp?

You will have to describe that flicker more closely. Unless you have changed your screen, or the machine shutter, or increased your light intensity, there can be no change in the flicker. If you have done any one of these three things that may account for it. As to the blue spot, it might be caused by (a) giving your lamp too great an angle; (b) improper setting of the carbons (See pages 204 to 212 of the Handbook); (c) wrong focal length condensers; (d) condensers too far apart in the mount.

La-Cemento.

John Edward Barnett, Cumberland, Md., sends in a sample of the film cement which he is marketing under the trade name of La-Cemento. In this cement brother Barnett has paid particular attention to eliminating the possibility of its sticking to the aperture plate. As a matter of fact a great deal of the fault attributed to the emulsion of first run films sticking to the aperture is really due to the surplus of cement used on the patches. If friend Barnett has succeeded in evolving a cement which will not develop this trouble, and is otherwise excellent, it will be a fine proposition. Mr. Barnett has trouble with his Power's Six A. His writing lacks something of being copperplate, but, as near as I can make it out, he has new tension springs, intermittent sprocket, and the sprocket shaft fits the bushing snugly, but there is side motion. I am not sure but that he also has up and down motion; I cannot decipher the thing with any degree of certainty. However, if there is end motion it is probably due to end motion in the intermittent sprocket, in which case loosen the collar on the intermittent sprocket shaft just inside the bushing, and set the collar over until there is no end motion in the sprocket shaft. See that the top gate rollers fit the film snugly. Also that the machine itself is well anchored and does not sway sidewise. If the motion is up and down be sure that the face of the intermittent sprocket is perfectly clean and that the sprocket shaft is not sprung. If neither one of these faults is present then most likely the sprocket itself is out of round. Also see to it that the sprocket is tight on its shaft.

The Optical System of a Moving Picture Machine.

By W. S. James.

All drawings and photographs in this article were made by Mr. James.

THE aim of this article is to set forth a method by which the operator may match the condensing and objective lenses of the optical system of a moving picture projection machine.

Before we touch the condenser problem I will explain a few of the peculiarities of the light rays with which we have to contend when we pass them through a lens. In Fig. 1A I have drawn an end view of a prism and represented a light ray by means of the line, and the direction the ray is supposed to be traveling by the arrows. A beam of light striking a prism is refracted, or turned, from its natural course. The amount of this refraction depends upon two principal things; the angle at which the ray strikes the prism and the angle of the prism itself. A 60 degree prism will bend a ray more so than one of 30 degrees. In Fig. 1B I have shown two prisms setting base to base. This is, theoretically, the way they set in a double convex, or positive lens. The angle of the refraction shows that the rays of light will come to a meeting, or focusing, point at F. With this still in mind let us consider Fig. 1C in which I have placed the prisms apex to apex. It will be seen by following the lines with the arrows that the rays will not meet, no matter at what angle they may enter the prisms, or at what angle the prisms are themselves. This is, theoretically, the action of a double concave, or negative, lens. A lens of this sort has no true focusing point, but for a matter of convience there has been a point determined which is called the "Virtual" focus. While this has no immediate value for the operator I have shown th point of virtual focus by "F", and the means of locating it by the dotted lines.

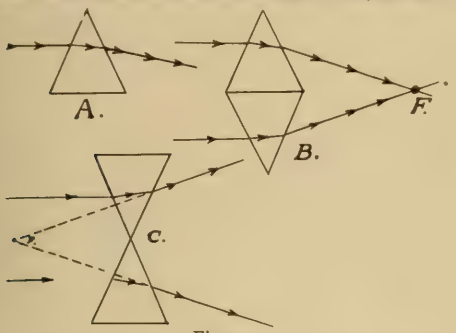

Fig. 1.

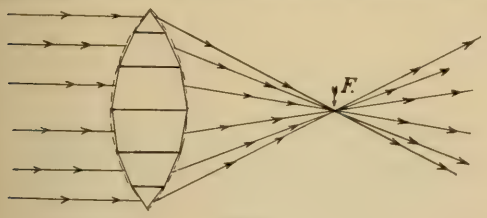

Fig. 2.

Now you must understand a lens is composed of many of these prisms of different angles, instead of just two such as I used to demonstrate refraction. To make this clearer I have drawn Fig. 2. In this I represent a double convex lens, but any lens that is convex (i.e. thicker in the middle than at the edges) will bring the rays to a focusing point. As I said before the different angles of the prisms will refract the light at different angles so that you now can see how all the rays are brought to a point of focus. This is not technically correct on account of there being spherical aberration, but is correct enough for the operator. From the foregoing we obtain the following rule:—

Positive lenses have a focusing point, while negative lenses have only a virtual focus.

Now that I have proven that a positive lens has a focus, I will try to explain the fact that each surface of a positive lens has a focus. These combined foci are called the "conjugate foci". From now on let us call the thing being projected the Object, and the picture that is projected, the change. The object is in focus wit hthe back of the lens if the position of the lens is so that it projects the image in focus. To make this a little clearer I have drawn Fig. 3A. If we were to place the object at the point now occupied by the image we would have an image in the place now occupied by the object. The difference being that the image will change its size accordingly. I want you to get the fact that the conjugate foci are interchangeable. This is of the greatest importance for this reason:—Suppose our arc (the object) was four inches from the back of the lens and the image was formed at a point ten inches from the front of the lens. Then if we put the arc ten inches from the rear of the lens the image would be formed four inches from the front. The image that was formed by the arc, when it was ten inches from the lens, would not be as bright, in proportion to the strength of the arc, as one formed when the arc was only four inches from the lens. The reason for this is:—The light rays travel in all directions from the crater of the arc, and the further they travel, the weaker they become. You will readily see from this we not only have a weaker light reaching the lens but a number of the rays are lost owing to their spreading and not reaching it. Just what I mean by this spreading I show in Fig. 4. Both condensers in this drawing are exactly the same size even though one looks smaller. From the foregoing we obtain this rule:—

The closer the condenser is to the arc, the more illumination we will have at the focusing point. (Not so close that we break one every minute.) In the lamp-house we change the points of conjugate foci by moving the lamp either toward or away from the condensing lenses; but in the moving picture head we move the lens itself.

Referring to Fig. 2, it will be noticed that the wider the angles of the prism the greater the refraction. Consequently, a lens made up of prisms of the wider angles will bend the rays enough more to bring them to a focus in a shorter distance. This is the reason the thick condenser has a shorter focal length than the thin one. In Fig. 3B I have drawn the condensing lenses in place of the single double convex lens used in Fig. 3A, otherwise, the drawings are the same and the interchangeableness of the conjugate foci remains. There is a change, but it is only to the extent that we now have the conjugate foci of the combination instead of that of a single lens. I think now I had better give a short explanation of what is meant by the focal length of a condenser. This is the distance taken for parallel light rays striking the condenser to come to a focus. The method of measuring the focal length is to measure how far this focusing point is from the face of the condenser. When we use two condensers we have the combined focus of the two to contend with. This focus is called the equivalent focus. The rule for finding the e. f. of the combination is:—

With the flat side of the rear condenser toward the sun (I say the sun as anything nearer will not give us parallel light rays) obtain as sharp an image as possible and measure the distance in inches from the image to the highest point of the convex surface. Call the result of this measurement F1. Now present the convex surface of the front condenser to the sun and obtain as sharp an image as possible and measure the distance in inches from the image to the flat side of the condenser. Now measure the thickness of the condenser and add two-thirds of this measurement to the last figure obtained and call the result F2.

Now the formula is:—F1 multuplied by F2, divided by F1 plus F2, minus the distance between the lenses. The result of these calculations is the equivalent focus.

It will be seen from this that if we change one condenser, or the distance they are separated from each other, we change the e. f. of the combination. Consequently, we also change the points of conjugate foci. Now as the points of the conjugate foci bear a certain relation to each other, that is, the image will be formed a certain distance from the lens in proportion to the distance the object is from the same lens, we change the crossing point of our condenser light ray.

While I do not want to make this a technical article it becomes necessary to give the formula for finding the missing point of focus of a conjugate foci, when the focus of the lens and one point are known. Let us call the image focus "fi" and the object focus "f" and the focus of the lens "F". The formula then becomes:—

1 divided by the object distance added to one divided by the image distance equals one divided by the principal focus.

Suppose we call the e. f. of the combination the principal focus and wish to find where the rays of the arc will come to a focus, or crossing point, when the arc is a certain distance from the condenser combination. Here is an example. Where will the image be formed when using a condenser combination of 3 inch e. f., with the arc four inches from the condensers? The arc being the object we will call it "f" and the crossing point being the image we will call it "fi". Then the example works out as follows: ¼ + 1/fi = ⅓ and "3fi" + 12 = "4fi". Then "1fi" = 12 or "fi" = 12 inches. The ray will come to a focus 12 inches from the condensers. It is advisable to study this thoroughly, since it is of the greatest importance, as you will see later.

Before going into the objective calculations it is advisable that I explain a few of the phenomena of a corrected lens. This is the kind used as an objective in moving picture work.

As you all know, the moving picture lens is composed of four lenses:—i.e.: Two positive and two negative. Let us consider the rear positive lens. As I have before stated, the action of parallel light rays striking this lens is to refract in such a way as to come to a focus. (Note:—Condenser light rays are not parallel.) After the light rays have passed through this lens of the combination there is an air gap of about one-eighth inch which they have to travel before reaching the negative lens. This can be seen by looking at the rear combination. It will be found to be separated by a small ring placed between the positive and negative lens. When the light ray reaches the negative lens it is spread again as shown in Fig 1C. This lens having no focusing point and having such a large v. f. it is impossible for the light rays to come to a focus, or crossing point after leaving it even though they strike it at a converging angle due to the action of the positive lens. This is the reason a picture cannot be projected successfully with the rear combination only. Therefore the condenser light ray cannot possibly cross in the center of the lens tube with this combination and the angles of the ray. After leaving this lens it has to pass through an air gap to the front combination. Here it encounters another negative lens (I will explain the reason for this lens later on.) which has a tendency to further spread the rays, but before it is able to do so this spreading is overcome by the front positive lens which is cemented to the front negative lens. To show this light ray as I have described it, I have drawn Fig. 6. The heavy lines "A-D" represent the condenser light ray and "O" is the crossing point, or in other words the focusing point.

This point is never in the lens, but always in front regardless of the focal length of the objective.

You may ask "Why are all these lenses needed?" So here is the answer.

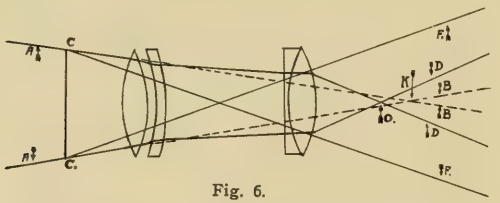

Fig. 6.

White light is really a combination of all colors; and when white light is passed through a prism it is separated so as to show the colors. This is what happens when the light goes through a single lens, on account of the action of the prism which composes the lens. To show the action of this "dispersion" of light as it is called, I show Fig. 7, which will give you the action clearly. As a test, throw the light from the condensers on the screen without any objective lens in the system. Suppose that before these rays had a chance to come to a focus and spread they were corrected by a negative lens, then this second lens would stop the dispersion. This is why there is more than one lens used before the objective combination. These are generally made of two different kinds of glass. One of the glasses used has a slightly greater power of refraction than the other. The combination is generally crown and flint glass. The flint glass has the greater power of refraction and almost double the amount of dispersion of crown glass when the angles are the same. Therefore—

If we make a negative lens of flint glass having a smaller angle to work in conjunction with a crown glass positive, of large angle, the rays of all colors are all bent, yet they come to a focus at the same point.

The reason for this is:—the flint glass negative of much smaller angle has less bending propensity than the crown positive will have but it will have about the same dispersion; i.e., it disperses the rays so as to separate the colors in almost exactly the same proportions as a crown glass positive of larger angle. The crown glass lens having the larger curvature and consequently shorter focal length it bends the rays more but the concave flint lens of less curvature bends them back in proportion so that they come to a focus as white light at the same point. Now that I have explained the reason for a corrected lens let us consider Fig. 8. In this I represent the objective lens tube by O. As we now understand that a lens has an indefinite number of conjugate foci, I have shown the points A-B and C-D. An object placed at A would be in focus at B, while at the same time an object at C would be in focus at D. Now suppose we replace A with the condensers. They would be in focus at B in Fig. 8 and point O in Fig. 6. Let us consider C as the film in Fig. 8 and C-C as the film in Fig. 6. Then C in Fig. 8 would be in focus at D, and C-C in Fig. 6, would be in focus at the screen which corresponds to D in Fig. 8.

From this we deduct:—that when B in Fig. 8 is focused correctly, D will be in focus accordingly.

In Fig. 6 the dotted lines A-B represent the shape of the condenser cone of light before it is passed through the objective lens. The light lines A-F represent the objective ray. (I did not show the refraction of this ray for the simple reason that up to the present time I have been unable to photograph a side view of it successfully. My authority for drawing it this way is the books on optics by the different professors. The lines A-D and A-F in Fig. 6 correspond with the lines C-D in Fig. 8. Where the lines A-D and A-F in Fig. 6 meet, is the focusing point for A-F and the virtual focus for A-D. Therefore:—

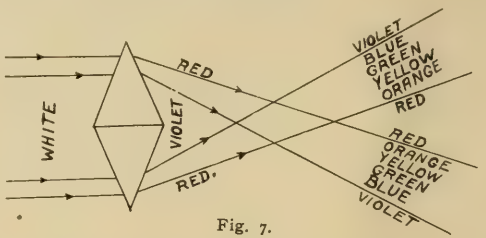

Fig. 7.

Where the lines A-F and A-D in Fig. 6 meet, the picture will be in focus with the best possible illumination. To represent this action I have drawn Fig. 9.

Let us suppose we had a condenser combination of such a long focus that point A Fig. 8 was somewhere in front of the condenser, then one point of focus of this particular conjugate foci would be the ghost of the light which is always prevalent a few inches in front of the condenser. Photo No. 6 was taken at point O Fig. 6, with a cracked condenser in the mount. Notice how the crack is in focus at this point. The large ring of light of poorer quality is the objective ray. When this light ray comes to a focus and crosses at O it comes to a point of virtual focus where the rays forming D and F in Fig. 6 meet. Therefore:—

The poorer part of the light, being focused all through the combination we have poor illumination at the screen.

From this we deduct the following rule:—a condenser combination that is too long for the objective lens will give us a ghost at the screen.

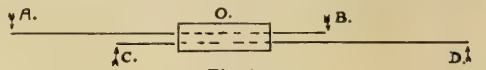

Fig. 8.

Again let us consider A Fig. 8. This time we will call it the arc. This condition can be caused by the condenser combination being too short. So short in fact, that the points of conjugate foci are the arc and point B Fig. 8. Now instead of having the condensers in focus at B, we have the arc. This will have its virtual focus meet the light ray A-F, Fig. 6, at the screen as in the former case; but we now have an image of the arc on the screen. From this the following rule is derived:—

A condenser combination of too short a focal length to match the objective will give us a highlight on the screen.

Now that I have explained the whys and wherefores I will get down to "brass tacks" and try and hand out the dope, but it is slightly complicated from now on and means study.

In the event of starting a new house and not knowing the focal length of the condensers needed, this is the way to figure them:—Let us consider the back condenser as a 6 inch focal length. I take this as a standard, as I want the rear condenser to have as short a focal length as possible, as shown in Fig. 4.

The reason for this is that the only duty of the rear condenser is to straighten out the diverging light rays and make them as nearly parallel as possible by the time they reach the front condenser. I have shown this action in Fig. 3B. As the focal length of a condenser is known by the distance it takes to bring parallel rays to a focus, we want a rear condenser that will furnish these parallel rays to the front one. Considering that the front condenser is receiving parallel rays, we will want a front condenser of such focal length as will bring these rays to a focus at the proper place. In Fig. 6 I show the objective light ray as crossing in the center of the objective lens tube. As this is the case, let us consider this as the optical center of the lens. Now measure from this point to the aperture plate. In the example I will use I find this distance to measure 6 inches. Now get a piece of paper and mark a point such as shown at O Fig. 10. Let this point represent the optical center of the lens. Six inches from this point draw a line to correspond to line B-B Fig. 10. This represents the position of the aperture plate. Now mark off fifteen-sixteenths of an inch, (or the width of the aperture which may vary slightly). The points C and D in Fig. 10 are these points. Now with a perfect straight edge draw two lines. One from O to C and the other from O to D. Prolong these lines as far as you can. Now with a rule measure across these lines keeping the rule parallel with B-B, until you reach a point where they measure 4½ inches apart. The 4½ inches is the diameter of the condenser. In the example I am using it will be found to be 26½ inches from point O, but for the matter of convenience in this article, and to make the explanation clearer, I will call it 26 inches. As it is impossible to get a condenser of 26 inches f. l. we must find another combination that will have the same equivalent focus as the combination of 6 inch and 26 inch condensers, remembering all the time to keep the f. l. of the rear condenser as short as possible. If we use the rule for finding the e. f. of the combination we will find that as F1 = 6 and F2 = 26 and 6 × 26 = 156 which is divided by 6 + 26 equals 4⅞ inches minus the separation of the condensers, ⅜ inch equals 4½ inches which is the e. f. of the combination.

We must find the combination with an e. f. of 4½ inches, but using a front condenser of such focal length as it is possible to procure.

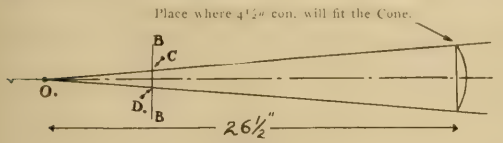

Fig. 10.

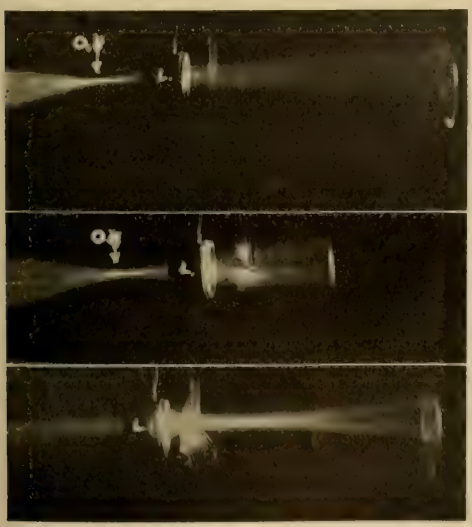
As I have worked out the example I will give it to you. F1=7¼ and F2 = 9½ and 7¼ × 9½ = 71 which divided by 7¼ plus 9½ equals 4¾ minus ¼ inch separation between the condensers, equals 4½ inches as the e. f. of this combination.

In order to place the arc in such a position so as to be sure it will come to a focus at a spot 26 inches from the condensers we revert to the formula I gave for finding the missing point of a conjugate foci. According to the formula, we have one divided by f plus one divided by twenty-six equals one divided by four and one-half and four and one-half fi plus one hundred and seventeen equals twenty-six fi; then seventeen plus fi equals one hundred and seventeen fi equals seven inches. Now recollect I only take this way to show you the way to go about it. If you should happen to have a 6 inch e. f. lens work out your own combination.

The formula as written out above I will put here in the form of a numerical equation.

$$1/f + 1/26 = 1/4.5$$
$$4.5fi + 117 = 26fi—$$
$$17 + fi = 117$$
$$fi = 7—\text{or } 7 \text{ inches}—$$

So far we have only been calculating the outer edge of the light ray cone. In doing this we have the poorer quality and dispersed light rays, caused by spherical aberration, passing through the aperture. But remember the condenser light ray should come to a focus, not at the optical center of the lens, but at the point O Fig. 6. Therefore we will move our lamp house forward enough to bring this point outside of the lens. With the lens in question bring it forward 6 inches. When this is done we will have a spot 2 inches in diameter at the aperture plate. The aperture cuts all the poor quality light off from the lens and only lets the good value pass through. There will be no ghost at the aperture if this is worked out correctly. It should stop about 3 inches back from the film. The correct position for the lamphouse is 15 inches from the center of the condensers to the aperture plate, if the arc is 4½ inches from the back condenser, or 12½ inches from condensers if the arc is 7 inches from the back condenser. Personally I know the 15 inch position is correct, but I gave the other for those of you who want to try it out, but remember Fig. No. 4.



Photos Nos. 1, 2, 3.

I have not finished here by any means as the spot on the shutter will tell you some stories if you know how to read it. To be able to do this, set your shutter at a point to correspond to point O Fig. 6, and run the machine. The spot on the shutter will then look like the photos accompanying this article. Photo No. 4 was made with condensers centered, but they were of too short focal length and were too close to the aperture. Photo No. 6, which I mentioned before, shows how the spot should appear when the condensors are correctly matched. Photo No. 5 shows the appearance of too long focal length condensers and condensers too close to the aperture. Photo No. 7 shows the condensers out of line with the aperture and objective lens vertically. If they were out of line horizontally the condenser ray would appear either above or below the center of the objective ray. Photo No. 8 shows the condensers of too long focal length and too far from the aperture. As to Photo No. 1 it was taken with the correct condenser combination, and to show the condenser ray at its focusing point, and also to show how far it is possible to carry the condensers from a short focal length objective. By having it at the point shown it helps eliminate travel ghosts which are very common with the short focal length objectives. It also makes the handling of the light easier. The lens used in the photos is a 1.3 size Gundlach and has an e. f. of 2¾ inches, which is rather short to work every day. Photo No. 2 was taken to show the action of the condensers when they are of too short focal length. Notice the ghost runs right up to the lens. Now for photo No. 3 (Mr. La Grow pay attention), this is the way the ray appears when the condensers are of too long focal length. Once again notice the rays appear to travel a few inches before they spread. In other words, the lens is working on the virtual focus of the condensers.

There is a way by which we may overcome ahe keystone effect. If you will look at photo No. 7 you will notice that the condenser ray has the appearance of a keystone. I will give you my word that the aperture used in this was the same one used in the others. This article explains the reason for it if you will dig it out. If none of you do, I suppose I will have to send that in also, but at the present time I am too tired to go on with it. I only hope you will chip in and help each other and incidentally find fault with me if I have gone wrong anywhere. I have been a long time fixing this up and have done a great amount of experimenting on it.

If any of you have an extremely hard combination I will figure it out for you, but please remember that postage stamps and time are money. Also be sure and send full details of everything or else it will be of no use.

THE MIDNIGHT CALL (Selig), March 31.—A complicated and interesting plot that contains several gripping scenes and surprises. It is a well made picture, bright in photography and ably directed. The acting is adequate. The methods adopted by a young doctor, who suspects the occupants of a mysterious house of criminal offenses, are unique and daring. He succeeds in rescuing a beautiful young lady from durance of two years, whose disappearance has startled the world. The acting is very well done.

CANNING INDUSTRY IN CALIFORNIA (Essanay), March 31.—This offering embraces all the different departments of the canning industry in California. It is interesting and embraces, particularly, the pea and asparagus output.

MYSTERY OF THE LAUGHING DEATH (Edison), March 31.—The fifth of the "Chronicles of Cleek" series. This plot contains originality and is out of the ordinary. It is incongruous in theme and not at all pleasant to look at. The characters are well sustained in all parts.

THE KNAVE OF CLUBS (Kalem), March 31.—This hilarious comedy is on the same reel with "In the Soup." The fun in this hinges on a trick police club.

IN THE SOUP (Kalem), March 31.—On the same reel with "The Knave of Clubs." It is rough and tumble.

A VISIT TO THE VOLCANO KILAUEA, HAWAII (Pathe), March 31.—This is the greatest of volcanoes in the Hawaiian Islands, and this picture depicts a journey to the crater, showing wonderful and unusual sights, quite a change from the ordinary scenic pictures, and very interesting.

TIVOLI AND ITS CASCADES, ITALY (Pathe), March 31.—This picture shows the beautiful gardens of the Villa of Esta, that date back to the 16th century, also the ancient temple of Sibyl with its legend. From a terrace of the temple can be seen the City of Rome. Farther along on this delightful trip one has a view of the celebrated Tivoli cascades. A beautiful and interesting picture.

FANCY SKATING (Selig), March 31.—This is on the same reel with "The Midnight Call." It illustrates the skill that can be acquired by those to whom the sport appeals. The gyrations of the professionals are wonderful.

MRS. ROMANA'S SCENARIO (Edison), April 1.—There are a few laughs squeezed out during this offering, but generally speaking it is ridiculous. Little can conscientiously be said in its favor.

THE MISSING TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS (Edison), April 1.—A comical tale of deception a husband concocts to deceive his wife after he has lost in a friendly game. He emerges from the mess of fabrication he has built around himself in the same condition husbands usually do when attempting to fool their wives. It is all amusing and entertaining—to look at.

A QUEER QUARANTINE (Essanay), April 1.—This must be an April Fool joke, as it is released the first of April. There is a superfluity of action, but of the kind that fails to "get over" for laughs. The acting is not wonderful and the plot is weak and unconvincing. It is disappointing and not up to the Essanay standard.

PROFESSOR OLDBOY'S REJUVENATOR (Kalem), April 1.—A visualization that is novel and laughable. The professor after trying it on the proverbial dog, and noting its success concludes to try it on himself. He meets his Waterloo, but demonstrates his theory is a success, but unpractical. His would-be son-in-law saves him from disaster by turning the apparatus backward and wins out. It is received with appreciation.

WHIFFLES PICKS A PARTNER (Pathe), April 1.—To secure a legacy Whiffles must first secure a wife, he is informed. He is in a quandary, as he has always avoided the gentle sex. Necessity drives and he enlists the aid of the Happywed Matrimonial Agency. After a varied experience he lands a "peach," but not without the worry of being compelled to whip into line a balky father-in-law. "Who is the boob now?" A well made and finely acted offering.

STAGE STRUCK (Vitagraph), April 1.—A bright comedy that must be seen to be appreciated—not wonderful, but immensely pleasing. Ada Clifford as the stagestruck wife sustains her role very artistically, as did Hughie Mack, "one of them there pesky book agents." All the cast deserve mention for their work. It gains hearty laughter and commendation from the spectators.

THE STORY OF DIANA (Selig), April 2.—A photoplay that is quite new in conception and blends reality with mythological legends. All of the characters, with the exception of Orion, the hunter, are first shown as gods or goddesses, and later in modern garb. Wolves and lions appear in the story and as a whole this makes a very unique production. It is whimsical, artistic and pleasing.

THE BURGLAR'S SACRIFICE (Biograph), April 2.—This picture demonstrates how a childless young couple come to adopt a foundling. A burglar of the gruff, good-natured sort, plays an interesting part in the story. The yarn is one of simple appeal, but is well pictured and will serve to entertain an audience very well.

DAN CUPID, ASSAYER (Essanay), April 2.—This Western offering is one of about average interest. Some of the opening scenes seemed a trifle dark. The story concerns the sale of a salted mining claim. Carl Stockdale, Reina Valdez and others appear. There is a fair amount of interest in this.

RIVAL COLLECTORS (Melies), April 2.—This half-reel is based on the stamp collecting mania. The plot as worked out is not very strong and serves only as an amusing trifle.

BATTY BILL'S LOVE AFFAIR (Melies), April 2.—In this number, on same reel with above, Batty's girl wears her mistress's clothes. The hat gets on fire and Bill ducks her in a tank, ruining the entire outfit. Fairly amusing.

TOMMY'S TRAMP (Vitagraph), April 2.—Bobby Harris again appears in this reel, playing the part of a boy who decides to become a tramp. His rescue from the burning building by his hobo friend was quite exciting. The whole reel has an appealing note in it and is well photographed.

THE CONFISCATED COUNT (Kalem), April 3. In which the girl's lover, a custom's officer, tries to collect duty on the count her mother has purchased for her to marry. Quite an amusing idea of a satirical nature in this, and one that is fairly well handled.

HISTORIC TARRYTOWN (Kalem), April 3.—This, on same reel with above, gives some interesting views of the Sleepy Hollow cemetery and other places of general knowledge along the Hudson near Tarrytown. Some of the photography is rather dim.

A MAN'S FAITH (Lubin), April 3.—A story of psychological interest, in which the photography is unfortunately rather dim in numerous places. Arthur Johnson plays the part of a deeply religious man who marries a girl of the woods. Later he becomes jealous of her and his faith is put to a severe test. This is well constructed and holds the interest.

BUNNY'S SCHEME (Vitagraph), April 3.—A bright, well-pictured comedy reel, in which Bunny carries his unwilling Flora away on the train, with appropriate wedding decorations that had been put up for another couple. This shows this well known comedy couple in their best form and brings much laughter.

THE BOND OF LOVE (Selig), April 3.—A half-reel with simple plot elements, in which a child is left at the door of an unhappy couple to restore peace in their home. This has quite a strong heart interest, but the photography is not up to standard in places.

IN AMALFI, ITALY (Selig), April 3.—Some entertaining views of this picturesque city on the cliffs; also showing the manner in which macaroni is made. On same reel with above.

BILL TELL, PAWNBROKER (Biograph), April 4.—A burlesque on "William Tell" vamped about to suit the author and producer. It is well costumed and finely visualized. Some of the acting is well done and some of it exaggerated to the limit. It caused little laughter.

SKELLY'S BIRTHDAY (Biograph), April 4.—On the same reel with "Bill Tell, Pawnbroker." This is really a funny offering and is appreciated as much by the spectators. Charles Murray gets in some of his "old time" stunts—with eggs, that get clear over to the back seats easily. A good picture in every respect.

HIS COMRADE'S WIFE (Edison), April 4.—This photoplay contains an interesting story; the plot is located in a military precinct. It shows the bravery and honor of one officer and the cowardice of another, who lost his life while fleeing from his duty. It is a good illustration of unselfish devotion, seeking to shield another from sorrow. It ends happily. The acting is adequate and scenic effects up to the standard of excellence.

THE COMING OF SOPHIE'S MAMMA (Essanay), April 4.—"She came, she saw, she conquered," in the finale, and she mussed up her son-in-law (Victor Potel) and the manufactured mother-in-law until they howled for mercy. This is a laughable comedy and legitimately produced and acted.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 14 (Selig), April 4.—Topical and interesting scenes from various parts of the world, including a bona fide duel between dramatists in Paris, scenes in Mexico, South America and Africa. Floods in Northern New York are also shown.

FAST FREIGHT 3205 (Kalem), April 4.—As the caption implies, this is a railroad picture concerning two telegraph operators in charge of small stations in the West. One is stricken with illness and the other, gossiping with the crew of the fast freight almost fails in getting the frantic calls to hold the freight to avert a collision. The sick operator's wife is the heroine that saves the situation. A realistic fire scene is incidental. A very good and attractive number.

SHE WAS A PEACH (Lubin), April 4.—A satisfying comedy that illustrates how a small town resident took his fling while visiting the city on business. Church business—think of it. He mixes pleasure with business and gets into trouble with his country sweetheart, who wakes him up to a sense of his wickedness and drags him to the minister.

THE EYES HAVE IT (Lubin), April 4.—On the same reel with "She Was a Peach." It is a burlesque on police rules and one of the force lays himself liable to discharge for disregarding. How his wife saves him from degradation furnishes the comedy. She requires him to swear off, in payment, which he does.

BOBBY, SOME SPIRITUALIST (Melies), April 6.—On the same reel with "Cabby's Nightmare." It is one of those precocious Bobby offerings.

He has some fun and inadvertently helps along with the seance until he has the medium and all the believers up in the air. He uses the usual expedient—thread.

CABBY'S NIGHTMARE (Melies), April 6.—This is a comedy of a farcical nature that is a horse on a man (the cabby's dream reversing the order of things). It is fantastical, but very comical. The horse even enters a saloon for a drink, and overloads the vehicle for his owner to pull. This will interest cabbies and horses.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 28 (Pathe), April 6.—A topical visualization of interest, presenting in rotation the embarking of Mexican federal soldiers on a train for the front. First game of baseball at St. Louis, Mo. The Orange Festival, at Los Angeles, Cal., with Mary Garden planting an orange tree and presenting an orange blossom to Mr. Pinkerton, the detective. Miss Nellie Tyler in Washington to plead her cause with President Wilson. Scenes at the immense fire at Morristown, Pa.

CLARENCE AND PERCY (Edison), April 6.—This offering can lay claim to certain merits as a comedy and has many strenuous scenes for the actors and actorines. Clarence and Percy get their share, and a dose or two more of aqua pura than the others in the cast. Well, they are the stars. This number got over the orchestra chairs for laughs.

MASTER OF THE STRONG (Biograph), April 6.—A strong picture is this, illustrating that though a man be possessed of dominating will in business transactions his heart has a tender spot that can be touched when the enchanted wand is the hand of a cherished one. This offering is as effective as a sermon; perhaps more so. The acting is all that can be desired and the other requisites pertains to the whole.

CHERRY (Vitagraph), April 6.—A comedy of the olden time that is cleverly carried out and gains much laughter. The plot is original and in many respects unique. The scenes, both interior and exterior, are splendid, the costuming corresponding with the era and the photography splendid.

PUPS ON THE RAMPAGE (Vitagraph), April 6.—Evidently on the same reel with "Cherry." Where the pups were picked from is a puzzler, but they are in evidence and good to look at; innocently mischievous and cute as pups can be.

THE PRICE OF SILENCE (Celio), March 31. A rather complicated plot. It requires the closest attention on the part of the observer to thoroughly visualize this offering. It demonstrates the vacillating nature of an heiress, who makes the sad mistake of giving up a worthy man for a worthless one. Later she is made to realize her folly. This is a well made picture in all details. The finale is pleasing.

A HELPFUL SISTERHOOD (Vitagraph), March 31.—There are peculiarities about this offering that to the reviewer seem faulty. If the working out of the plot were as clear as the photography it would be a superior picture. The bevy of girls in the cast, in good looks and acting could scarcely be improved upon.

THE FIGHTING BLOOD (Lubin), April 1.—Army and navy life is always an enticing subject to the layman, possessing a certain glamor that stirs the sparks of heredity and patriotism. Unfortunately the hero in this picture-play has a weakness which overcomes his will at the psychological moment. The indomitable fighting blood of his ancestors, which fills his veins, redeem him in the finale, and he not only conquers his weakness, but also his enemies. A strong and beautiful picture. It is worthy of a place on any program.

THE RAID OF THE RED MARAUDERS (Kalem), April 1.—This two-part picture is laid in a military post in the West and is full of thrills that sustain the closest interest from start to finish. It is ably acted and directed. The scenes are bright and varied in the exteriors. A theme of love and daring gives it a romantic flavor.

THE MANSION OF SOBS (Lubin), April 2.—This two-reel story, by Shannon Fife, mingles grief and happiness in an old-fashioned manner. The scientist neglects his wife, who becomes infatuated with an attorney. They separate and she lives at an inn, leaving the son at the estate with his father. Years pass and the son grows up and falls in love with the attorney's daughter. The return of the wife to her husband, whose mind was slightly affected by his lonely, selfish life, seemed a little improbable. The story is quite entertaining, but only fairly strong in its general handling. It has an English setting. John E. Ince, Percy Winter and Rosetta Brice are in the cast.

HIS SWEETHEART'S CHILD (Pathe), April 2.—This two-reel offering is nicely acted and beautifully pictured throughout. Mlle. Malraison plays the double role of mother and daughter, the story covering a long period of years. In the first reel the peasant girl gives up her first lover for an artist. Her married life proves unhappy and in later years the first lover cares for her child. The story, so artistically put on and while rather obvious in plot, is entertaining.

A ROMANCE OF THE EVERGLADES (Edison), April 3.—An entertaining two-reel number, written by Mark Swan, with Mabel Trunnelle and Herbert Prior in the cast. The scenes are laid in the swampy region of mosshung trees known as the Everglades. The introduction of the three "crackers" was a good touch, and the part of May Lou was particularly well played. The story itself is full of interest and grows quite exciting in the part where Carew is in danger from the infuriated mob and the shack is set on fire. A good production.

THE WEDDING OF PRUDENCE (Essanay), April 3.—A two-reel comedy number, telling a story of early Colonial days. Prudence is about to be married to a man of her father's choice, but the hero lowers a cat from the attic and tears off the bad fellow's wig, exposing him to ridicule. Later it is proved that he is a "fraud" and not a fit man for Prudence to wed. The settings are not elaborate, but carry the atmosphere fairly well. As a whole the number is quite entertaining throughout.

THE CRUCIBLE OF FATE (Vitagraph), April 4. Two reels of splendidly made scenes, visualizing a potential plot that develops naturally—an affluent and adoring husband, a devoted wife, and a baby to weld the happy union—what more can be desired to make life paradisical. But the woman's vacillating nature swayed by a lack of domestic duties induce her to dabble in amateur dramatics. Forgetting her husband and child in her histrionic ambitions, she ruins her own life and that of her husband. It is a touching picture and well acted and produced. The beautiful and wonderfully clever little girl in the cast deserves special mention.

IN TANGLED WEB (Pathe), April 4.—The schemes of an unscrupulous parasite and gambling leach on society, are frustrated apparently by fate. A trusting girl is made to suffer, and a family almost disgraced through his selfish machinations. Through the two reels its intensity holds close attention. Good acting, good photography, and splendid direction obtained.

THE CABARET DANCER (Kalem), April 6.—One would be prone to conclude from the caption of this two-reel picture that the plot might be more or less frivilous, but it is far from it. It is an interesting and convincing theme, carrying with it an illustration of devotion and sacrifice that is beautiful. There are several scenes in this picture that drive serious thoughts straight home, although some cabaret scenes pertain. The photography, acting and direction are up to the standard. The author had an inspiration evidently. Alice Joyce is in the lead and no more need be said.

THE CRUEL CROWN—THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, NO 8 (Selig), April 6.—Kathlyn certainly has numerous and hairbreadth escapes in this two-reel offering. It is a hair-raising experience to take in. It is gripping and exciting all the time. It is also continued in our next, just at the critical period. It is a meritorious visualization in its entirety.

Independent

HER FIRST LESSON (Princess), April 3.—What excuse the producers of this picture will have for releasing it will be welcomed; if it ever gets by. There is nothing in it to cause the censors to condemn, nor is there anything of merit pertaining to recommend it. Dancing is introduced by Nellie Williams.

SADDER BUT WISER (Royal), April 4.—This plot could have been vamped into a fine little comedy had it been properly produced. Exaggeration abounds that is far from being laugh-producing or sensible; in geration abounds that is far from being laugh-producing or sensible in that are passé.

THE STAR BOARDER (Keystone), April 4.—This is one of Mack Sennett's farcical comedies which causes hearty laughter all through the action. It is certainly rapid-fire and has been well photographed.

MACK AT IT AGAIN (Keystone), April 6.—Yes, Mack Sennett is at it again, as is Mabel Normand. They are "cuttin' up" as usual out at their fun factory. This one is where Mack has gone back to work and he certainly hustles some, and makes his actors follow suit. This offering is a continuous laugh-producer from start to finish.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 12 (Reliance), April 6.—This is a most acceptable installment of "Our Mutual Girl" series. There are pathetic touches in it and the current events are all new and interesting.

AN INTERCEPTED GETAWAY (Majestic), April 7.—This is an old style cowboy comedy with a few sparse laughs here and there. The theme has been worn threadbare long ago.

THE FATAL DRESS SUIT (Komic), April 8.—This is decidedly laughable. The acting all the way through is genuinely funny and the situations are equally so. It is a story of a man whose new dress suit is filled with powder by a hated rival and who learns in the midst of the festivities of a ball that he is likely to explode any moment. Funny complications follow, which find their climax when the explosion actually takes place.

THE PASSING OF IZZY (Keystone), April 11.—A clever rapid-fire farcical comedy that contains better elements and less horse-play than is usually indulged in by the Keystone actors. It gets over equally as well as the other style. Izzy is naturally portrayed, sensibly made-up and costumed. A good number for laughs. Everyone in the cast got a bath—some got two—and in the winter-time.

SOME BULL'S DAUGHTER (Apollo), April 12.—This picture introduces Fred Mace in a new character, that of an Indian, and Fred is some Indian. "Big Ingin," heahy, "eat heap." Marguerite Loveridge makes a charming squaw. No wonder big chief loves her; so does everybody else. Take a look and you will coincide. The costuming and photography are fine.

THE HUNCHBACK (Majestic), April 12.—A meritorious Western drama that is splendidly produced and acted. Frank Turner does fine real artistic work as the hunchback, a difficult role to sustain. Never once does he lose his grip on the characterization. Lillian Gish did equally as well in the part of the orphan.

AN HOUR OF YOUTH (Thanhouser), April 12.—A novel offering that is well done and interestingly worked out. There is incontinuity pertaining, either the fault of the author or director, as no satisfactory explanation by title as to where the gem, or as he is termed the "Master of Mysteries" came from, or what caused his appearance. There was some winter where this picture was made. It is beautifully photographed.

PRINCE WILLY (Eclair), April 12. A half-reel of foreign make in which the scenes are nicely colored. The little prince exchanges places with a peasant boy and finally gives himself up in order that his poor friends may get the reward. This is an attractive film story.

NUTTY AND HIS FATHER (Eclair), April 12. This, on same reel with above, is an eccentric comedy which keeps the observers constantly laughing. The plot is not very much, but the little boy known as Nutty, Jr., is very funny. A good comedy number.

GRANDFATHER'S ROMANCE (Eclair), April 12.—A story enacted entirely by children in the make-up of older persons. The little boy entertains his girl friend by telling the story of his grandfather's early life. The children are clever and the film proves quite attractive.

A BATHHOUSE BEAUTY (Keystone), April 13.—Talk about action and stunts to produce comedy, it is all incorporated in this picture. The strenuousness indulged in by the cast certainly kept the cameraman awake. The seashore resort scenes are hummers, taking in all the various devices. The facility with which they are engaged in the plot does credit to the director. It causes hilarious laughter.

NOTORIETY (Imp), April 13.—King Baggot here gives some laughable impersonations of the old time actor of the "ham" variety. He has a good deal of trouble meeting board bills and is thrown in jail. The story is not much, but the characterization is entertaining. Frank Smith gives an occasional assist throughout the reel.

UNIVERSAL IKE MAKES A MONKEY OF HIMSELF (Universal Ike), April 14.—A characteristic number, in which Universal Ike becomes jealous of the actress lady's pet orang-outang, and acts as a substitute in order to win her favor. This is quite novel and has numerous laughing moments.

AN UP-TO-DATE COOK (Crystal), April 14.—Vivian Prescott and Charlie DeForrest in a half-reel comedy. This lacks plot and is too thin for enjoyment.

THREE MEN AND A GIRL (Crystal), April 14.—This, on same reel with above, is better. The plot is not strong, but the girl's experiences with her three lovers makes some amusement. This could have been developed into a longer comedy number.

THE TEST (Nestor), April 15.—Wallace Reid and Dorothy Davenport appear in this. The plot is rather novel. The poor man, professing love for his family, drinks what he presumes to be poison in order to make a thousand dollars for them, but the drink proves to be harmless. Just a little episode, rather well played.

HOW GREEN SAVED HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW (Joker), April 15.—A farce-comedy written by Grace Cunard. It will amuse at times. Green has trouble with his mother-in-law. When his home takes fire he sees a figure leaning from the window and assumes it is his wife. The supplicant for help is wearing his wife's kimono—at least she did in some of the scenes; in others it appeared she did not. There are many hurly-burly attempts at rescue. The falling back of the crowd at the stairs seems a bit drawn out.

THE CUCKOOVILLE HORSE RACE (Frontier), April 16.—The principal feature in this film is a race between Fritz, the baker, and Pat, the grocer, in their delivery wagons. While they are contending, a third party steals the girl. The picture does not get up enough suspense to be very strong.

THE BOOB INCOGNITO (Rex), April 16.—Robert Leonard has an entertaining character part in this. An amusing situation develops when the schemers take the boob janitor and dress him up as an Earl in order to cure the girl of her love for titles. A pleasing number.

PITFALLS (Powers), April 17.—There are dramatic moments in this story, produced by Edwin August. There is an excellent cast, and one of its best players is Eugene Ormonde, who was secured by Mr. August on his recent trip east. He will make a valuable addition to the company. Edna Maison plays opposite to Mr. August. The story is one of renunciation. Hal August and Alice Rhodes are the others in the story, which is well put on.

MAN'S BEST FRIEND (Frontier), April 18.—A Western story of the conventional type. The sheriff sets a deadly trap by which his rival is to be shot, but the dog springs the contrivance and renders it harmless. This is well pictured, but somewhat jerky in construction.

Independent Specials

THE MYSTERIOUS SHOT (Reliance), April 4.—The splendid acting of Henry Walthall and the equally splendid photography together with the superb settings constitute the chief merits of this two-reel play. The story itself is of the "revenge" variety and contains little that is new. It is the film adaptation of a short story, the like of which may be found in almost any magazine. It is, nevertheless, a production of some merit and the climax is especially strong.

A DEBUT IN THE SECRET SERVICE (Thanhouser), April 7.—A two-reel release of the "Diplomatic Free Lance" series. The author is Clarence H. New. James Cruze interprets Lord Trevor in connection with the head of the secret service. Government files have been stolen, which include plans of coast fortifications. Flo La Badie in the character of Nan through clever subterfuge regains them for the government. This picture-play is interesting and splendidly acted. The direction and photography are also well done. A good feature.

THE COLONEL'S ORDERLY (Domino), April 9.—A beautiful and interesting two-reel love story, concerning military life, is worked out in this plot, and many exciting scenes in beautiful Western environments are produced. There is much that is melodramatic in the theme and it is all very interesting and well acted.

TEXAS BILL'S LAST RIDE (Majestic), April 5.—This two-reel production is a visualized dime novel of the yellowest and most offensive kind. It is the sort of picture that puts a weapon in the hands of the advocates of extreme censorship. There is a hold-up, an attempted rape with a bad title and a realistic fight between the hero and the villain. The second reel is almost taken up with an old-fashioned riding chase. The plot is diffuse, loose jointed and antiquated.

THE GEISHA (Kay-Bee), April 10.—In scenic selections, photography, lighting and direction this two-reel picture really excels. The plot is misleading in many places. It is a love story concerning an American naval officer and a Japanese Geisha girl. The acting of all in the cast is to be commended. This is a meritorious offering in all respects.

THE LITTLE MAIL CARRIER (Victor), April 10.—A very entertaining number is this two-part reel, featuring Florence Lawrence as a mail carrier dressed in boys' clothes, and Matt Moore as the city man who takes her to his hunting lodge when she is injured. The genuine winter storm scene and general atmosphere of the piece are pleasing. The story is at no time dramatic, but there is always a pull on the interest and it is well worth while. The photography is also good.

THE GODFATHER (Reliance), April 11.—This is a strong two-reel play and is well acted. It illustrates the inherited weakness of a youth given over to the gambling mania. The disintegration of character, the power of the vice of gambling over its victim and the futile efforts to resist the baneful passion are portrayed with commendable fidelity to life. The play has an unusually powerful moral. The acting is good throughout and the photography, especially the dissolving effects, are up to a high standard.

THE LAST SUPPER (American), April 13.—There are many fine points in this two-reel picture, which make it resemble "Pippa Passes," in spots at least. The idea of applying the influence of Christ to modern conditions as a living force is fraught with dramatic power. There are, however, some blemishes in the films, notably the looseness with which the Bible is quoted. Just why this feature is called "The Last Supper" it is somewhat hard to understand. Nor is the meaning of the last scene very clear to the average spectator. On the whole, however, the production is deserving of praise. Acting and photography are good.

THE BOLTED DOOR (Victor), April 13.—A three-reel number featuring Warren Kerrigan and Vera Sisson. The story is very entertaining, and concerns a young couple who marry to gain a fortune. But the wife keeps the bolted door between them until she has learned to love her husband. It does not strike the observer as very probable, as there was really no reason why she should not find him an acceptable husband from the start. But it makes a good story and fortunately the delicate matter of the closed door is handled with sufficient care so that it should not offend. The situation is not entirely new, but is pleasingly presented in this instance.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY (Gold Seal), April 14.—This two-reel number is the beginning of a series of fifteen stories, written by "The Master Pen." The style is one of ultra-mystery and deals with the villainous Hugo's attempts to revenge himself upon General Love, his hated rival of former days. Grace Cunard and Francis Ford play the leads and Ernest Shields handles the part of the minor villain creditably. This is frankly melodramatic in treatment, but abounds in action and adventure. A hydro-aeroplane appears in this first number. The production is loosely constructed at times, but in the main the interest is well sustained. It promises to be an entertaining series chiefly because it attempts so much.

CAPTAIN JUNIOR (Broncho), April 15.—A strong two-reel story depicting life in a military post, the leading part being the captain's little son who has been dubbed Captain Junior on account of his military ambition. He is a "chip of the old block." A love story with a good ending runs through the plot. Many "gripping" scenes are shown that hold interest. To make the story more complete one or two scenes should have been introduced.

WHEN THE GIRLS JOINED THE FORCE (Nestor), April 17.—This two-reel offering makes an interesting demonstration of the woman police force, headed by Stella Adams, at Universal City. They parade the busy streets of Los Angeles. Eddie Lyons, Lee Moran, Victoria Forde and other members of the Nestor company conduct a little comedy in connection with this. The men contrive to get arrested and are served tango tea at police headquarters. This makes good press agent material for Universal City and at the same time will entertain an audience very well, though the story itself is not strong.

DOLORES, LADY OF SORROWS (Bison), April 18.—This two-reel number comprises a story of Western life, with Cleo Madison in the part of a Mexican girl. There is a good Western town setting and the clear photography helps the film very much. The story is one of about ordinary interest, in which the villain is a Mexican named Miguel. He deserts a woman he has wronged and strives to win the heroine's love, but is defeated in this project. The atmosphere is good and some of the scenes are quite attractive.

LUCILLE LOVE, THE GIRL OF MYSTERY, Series No. 2 (Gold Seal), April 21.—The first reel of this two-reel number moves along in a somewhat mechanical way, showing the girl's arrival on the boat after the hydro-aeroplane descends, her meeting with the villainous Hugo and the manner in which she gets the valuable papers away from him. The shipwreck, and her landing on a cannibal island are nicely pictured and get hold of the interest strongly. The subsequent adventures of the girl will no doubt be awaited with much interest. The village of the blacks and their fiendish joy on capturing her get up a situation that will make the observer want to see more.

THANHOUSER TO PICTURE FORMER BANDIT.

Al Jennings, former bandit, whose life story constitutes one of the most remarkable human documents ever written, will arrive in New Rochelle April 12, to confer with C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, which company will produce "Beating Back" for Direct-From-Broadway-Features.

"Beating Back," the name given by Will Irwin to Jennings' story as run in the Saturday Evening Post, will be in six reels. The scenario will follow closely the Post story. The fight at the Spike S ranch, which will be remembered by those who read the one-time outlaw's life story will be reproduced, with an accuracy embracing all details.

Jennings' life—county prosecutor, bandit and convict, is unprecedented in our history, for the people of Oklahoma, where he committed his crimes are now accepting his candidacy for the governorship, in which fight, if he is successful, Jennings will have an imperishable record of his "Beating Back" against society.

BERT ENNIS OFF FOR TEXAS.

Bert Ennis, publicity expert for the Eclair Film Company, has departed for Texas on a combination business and pleasure trip. A long siege of hard work, with the Eclair fire adding to the strain, got Bert a little off his stride and as a relief he will loaf along toward Texas, stopping off here and there to see how Eclair is being received. After a few weeks rest in Texas he will return to the Eclair offices in New York.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

TOOK in the Universal's show at the Republic Theater on Saturday night. It was the fifth day after that of the re-debut of King Baggot as a player before the footlights. Or maybe it was behind the footlights, as was insisted on one occasion by a man for whose opinion we have great respect. Nevertheless, the footlights were between the players and the audience. And to digress again, it was a sure-enough audience this time. You know, the sticklers say, and to be sure with all justification, we must not use the word "audience" when referring to a gathering assembled for the purpose of looking at a picture or pictures. (Would they have us say "spectators," as if the occasion were a prizefight or a baseball game?)

King Baggot appearing in person at the Republic.

The first thing on the program was that good two-reel farce, "She Was Only a Working Girl," and those who were later on destined to comprise a real audience laughed at the rough stuff of those cut-ups Victoria Forde, John Steppling, Lee Moran et al. By the way, this comedy has been working every day since the Republic was turned over to pictures and seems to be going strong. It was run on Saturday night at an unconscionable speed, however, which appeared to be on the part of the operator a work or crime of supererogation, if we may be pardoned the super-criminal inversion. At the risk of starting something with our operator friends it is here contended that on the question of speed the operator's duty is fulfilled when he projects his picture at the rate of sixty feet a minute without attempting to repair by acceleration or otherwise what in his opinion is an error on the part of a cameraman. The director is responsible for a production; he understands a thing or two about speed—that is one of the chief elements in his business equipment. The greatest producers are those who understand, who appreciate, the art that lies in restrained action. Jumping such a scene through a projector at the rate of eighty or a hundred feet a minute spells ruin for dramatic effort. So, also, accelerating the projection of a comedy is worse than folly—whether it be due to managerial orders or not.

Now that this wheeze is off our chest and also perhaps on our head, after the six-reel "Samson" was finished the curtain rose on a studio setting. Present were the entire cast of "The Baited Trap," a short melodrama—that is, all except the leading man, who was detained at the Screen Club, according to the telephone message received on the stage by Frank W. Smith, finely disguised in a footlight make-up. Mr. Smith announced to the company that as part of the picture had been finished they would retire to the projection room and have a look at it. The screen dropped, and "The Baited Trap" went on. The program announces that the subject makes no pretense of being other than a simple affair designed to show the mechanical side of taking motion pictures.

The story is of young Dennis leaving Ireland, bidding goodbye to Nora. Arrived in New York Dennis gets work in a saloon. Black Louie, his employer, sees a photograph of Nora and gives Dennis the money to send for her. When the girl arrives Dennis is arrested on a "plant," while two emissaries of Black Louie meet Nora and conduct her to a house kept by a woman of a class seemingly very popular on the stage these days. Dennis, through the aid of a friendly newsboy and a policeman, has been released from custody and is close on the trail of the abductors. He climbs to the roof of the aforesaid house and lets himself down through the skylight when—the curtain rises and we see the stage again.

On walks King Baggot, to the applause of a house that filled orchestra, balcony and gallery. He sits down at a little table and adjusts a red wig—which surely makes him look very much unlike the president of the Screeners. He inquires of Craven (Howard Crampton) how he liked the picture. With a look of disgust the player tells him they left out his big scene—the close-up.

"Never mind, Howard, you'll have a fine part next week—a lead," says the Imp leading man.

Howard's face lightens perceptibly. "Fine!" he remarks. "What's the title?" And he rubs his hands.

"'The Grouch!'" replies King, and the smile fades from the face of Howard.

There is quite a bit of this airy persiflage, whatever that may be, during the making up of Mr. Baggot. Then the leading man is hoisted above the stage, up under the lamps. The trapeze is halted just out of the camera's range. The setting is divided into two rooms, which is doubling up on the picture, as the finished product shows separately the events occurring in each room. The camera is placed on the steps leading from the center aisle to the stage, and ostensibly covers the entire setting.

Dennis drops to the floor—from the skylight, of course—and the deep-dyed rascals Craven and Blondie in the next room hear him. Blondie puts his hand over Nora's mouth and Craven fires a pistol at the door. A large vase on a table neglects to break, and everything is off. A spring arrangement fails to work. Business of disgust on the part of all. They try again. All goes well until it is discovered Craven's revolver will not go off. Director Smith again stops proceedings.

"Hey, what kind of a property man have you got here?" inquires Crampton.

"What's the trouble?" replies Prop. Gravelius. As he takes the weapon in his hand it discharges. Business of peevishness all around.

The weapon is fixed up and the work is resumed. All goes swimmingly. Dennis goes out on the fire escape and enters the next room. With a pistol he induces the two bad men to raise their hands. Nora is just opening the door to safety and the arms of her lover when Cameraman Schlessinger moans. He has run out of film. Dennis tells them to begin again at the point where he enters the window and the situation may be saved by the insertion of a sub-title, "Hands Up!" So the scene is finished. Then the screen descends, and Mr. Smith describes the pictures thrown on the screen, which show the course of developing and printing of negative and positive, drying, assembling, etc. At the last is shown a scene similar to the one the audience has just witnessed.

There can be no question as to the deep interest of the audience in the whole proceeding. "King Baggot & Co." appear every day at 4 and 9 o'clock, and the innovation has had a most decided influence on the attendance. Among picture men there are those who question the wisdom of letting in the public "behind the scenes," as it were; but the public is making no complaint. Apparently the Universal Film Company has struck a popular note.

There must have been unusual interest for Norma Talmadge in the making of "A Helpful Sisterhood," the Vitagraph special for Tuesday, March 31. The big school building that forms so conspicuous a background in many of the scenes is Erasmus Hall, a Brooklyn high school. There used to be a story in circulation in that neighborhood—three years ago, say—of a group of girls standing near old Erasmus. A Vitagraph director taking a scene inquired if one of the girls would step into it. Norma Talmadge stepped in. She has been with the Vitagraph Company ever since, and her work has steadily improved. Van Dyke Brooke, her director, is enthusiastic in praise of the talent of his young leading woman and prophesies great things for her.

In the recently released Warner's Feature "The Eye of the Government," a Gene Gauntier, three-part subject, Sid Olcott puts over a stunt that has no string to it. It is over the side of an ocean steamship under full speed, and he is on a rope. The scene is as picturesque as it is thrilling. Mr. Olcott portrays a detective. His object is to examine the suit case of a passenger. He is let down until he reaches the stateroom, into which he climbs through the porthole. The camera is placed on the side of the ship and shows the descent and the return. Below him are the ominous churning white and rapidly receding waters, in the background is the vast, undotted ocean. If in the preliminary examination of that bit of hemp Mr. Olcott had used a magnifying glass his precaution would have been justified. "The Eye of the Government" is a fine picture all the way—a real travelogue with a distinct dramatic touch, or more accurately, an excellent drama that included in its portrayal many interesting views of New York harbor, on shipboard, and of points in Ireland and London. The photography is notable.

"Judith of Bethulia," the General Film's four-part Biograph, is still on the screen at Proctor's Fifth Avenue. It is now the headliner, the title being blazoned across the front where in past years so many famous theatrical names have appeared. The evening admission prices are 75 cents for orchestra chairs, and they are filled every night. The general public seems to be waking up to a fact realized by film men in the beginning: "Judith of Bethulia" is big stuff, as big as the biggest.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Jones, Linick & Schaefer Acquire the Studebaker.

THE Studebaker Theater, on South Michigan avenue, passed into the control of Jones, Linick & Schaefer on Friday, April 3. This firm already is operating the Colonial, McVicker's Theater and the La Salle Opera House, all in the Loop.

According to the papers transferring the Studebaker from the control of Dillingham & Connor and Klaw & Erlanger to the vaudeville firm, the new lessees will take possession on May 1. It is expected that the Studebaker will join the ranks of Chicago theaters given over to popular priced vaudeville and pictures.

"I am glad that Jones, Linick & Schaefer have taken over the Studebaker," said Harry J. Powers, Klaw & Erlanger's Chicago representative. "The passing of the Studebaker will put the other theaters in better shape. It can be said now that there are just about enough so-called high-price theaters to take care of the attractions and to enable them all to make money."

Just one year ago Jones, Linick & Schaefer purchased McVicker's Theater from Litt & Dingwall; a few days later they leased the Colonial, and in January of this year they took over the La Salle Opera House from Harry Askin.

Already controlling twelve high-class vaudeville theaters in the city, Jones, Linick & Schaefer have taken over a house that is associated with many memories. Colonel Henry W. Savage produced his light operas at this house for several years. Sarah Bernhardt also appeared in it. It then passed into the control of R. E. Harmeyer, who in turn passed the management to Dillingham & Connor, with Klaw & Erlanger as associate owners.

It is said that the Studebaker will be added to the chain of show houses owned and leased by the combination formed recently, when the Sullivan-Considine interests were purchased by Aaron J. Jones and New York men.

It is also rumored that the directors of the Fine Arts Building Corporation, which owns the Studebaker, will not permit popular-priced vaudeville to be run in the theater, and court proceedings may be invoked to prevent it if Jones, Linick & Schaefer attempt it.

Charles C. Curtis, vice-president and managing director of the corporation, expressed surprise when shown an announcement to the effect that Klaw & Erlanger had subleased the place to the Chicago firm of popular-priced vaudeville fame.

Permission had been granted Klaw & Erlanger, a lawyer for that firm said, to show the highest class of films in the Michigan avenue house dedicated to the drama. Introduction of vaudeville is considered another matter.

The truth is, no one knows just what Jones, Linick & Schaefer intend to offer in the Studebaker. It is whispered that the house will be opened with a great feature film subject, which will be run throughout the summer months and that the Chicago triumvirate intend making it the home of the greatest offerings in moving pictures in the city.

Suggestive Plays and a Vulgar Picture Condemned.

Holbrook Blinn and his clever company at the Princess Theater, this city, have had a trying week of it. Moving Picture Censor John O'Callahan, under Deputy Funkhouser, condemned five of Director Blinn's plays as being suggestive and unfit for even an adult audience to see; whereupon Mayor Harrison ordered the Princess management to show why that theater should not lose its license.

Mr. Blinn, in an interview, is reported to have said: "Art is art, and the movies are movies, and never the twain shall meet.

"The point I wish to make is that whatever the five plays we are producing here may be, they are not motion pictures, and should not be judged from that standpoint. The movies are censored, so your Major Funkhouser has frequently declared, with a view of protecting the chief patrons of motion picture shows, the children. Our plays are very frankly not intended for children. They are red, red meat intended for very healthy and adult stomachs."

He is also credited with other deprecatory remarks about moving pictures. They are altogether beneath Mr. Blinn's exalted consideration. He measures them by the intelligence of Sergeant O'Callahan, who is altogether a well meaning and worthy man, although he may not be much of an art critic.

Mr. Blinn, after an interview with the Mayor, saw fit to make a change in his weekly program in order to save the license of the Princess.

Art is art; but sometimes the spurious is mistaken for it. Let Mr. Blinn take moving pictures seriously. They may teach him that they combine both science and art.

On the other hand, Percy Hammond, the able dramatic critic of the Tribune, holds up for unmeasured censure a moving picture entitled "Across the Hall," which he viewed in McVicker's Theater one day last week. He referred to this picture as follows:

"I wonder if Sergeant O'Callahan would frown at a moving picture I saw the other day. It was at McVicker's Theater, where I was called to pass upon Lew Shank, an ex-Mayor of Indianapolis, who was acting successfully as a comic monologist. This moving picture was entitled 'Across the Hall,' and its items included incidents that were incredible in their sheer vulgarity. Hopelessly degraded human beings were exhibited in an infinite variety of nauseating episodes, so sickening that half of the audience departed ere they were concluded. The immorality of it was its least visible aspect. The actors in it were not human, nor animal, nor insect, but vermin. They did crawling things that made you nervous when you got out. They reduced you, on these films, to nasty, unbelievable dirt, and you felt sorry, if you were there, that you were a human being. I believe that 'Across the Hall' is more evil in its effects than all the smart Princess plays congregated together, and I ask Sergeant O'Callahan to tell me where I am wrong."

Major Funkhouser's Powers Shorn by Chief.

Chief of Police Gleason issued an order last week that deprived Second Deputy Funkhouser of fully one-half of his powers.

Henceforth the major's police activities will be confined to making inspectors and reporting on them to the chief—and not to making raids. Also the policewomen will work under orders from First Deputy Schuettler instead of the major and Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton.

"The women are a part of the active police force—Major Funkhouser is not," said Chief Gleason after issuing the order. "He is an investigator, not charged with the enforcement of the law. He is expected only to look for violations of the law and report them to me.

"His reports in the past have been made monthly and were of no value, for they usually were anticipated by the reports of the Committee of Fifteen.

"The policewomen will be assigned to police district stations, and work under orders of First Deputy Schuettler. They can cover the dance halls in their districts. I intend to have a policewoman detailed to each railway station.

"I have heard that the policewomen have been sent to Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton for instructions. The place for them is in active service."

Major Funkhouser thinks it will be a sad mistake for the policewomen to work from the police stations.

Chicago Film Brevities.

William N. Selig informs me that the new Strand Theater, New York City, will be opened Saturday, April 11, with "The Spoilers" as the attraction. Sousa, America's famous composer and leader, will weild the baton for the occasion, with an orchestra of 30 pieces.

George A. Blair, of the Cine Film Department of the Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y., and E. E. Blake, European representative in London, England, spent several days in Chicago last week. I had also the pleasure of meeting Lewis B. Griffin, manager of the exhibition, favored the World office with a call, but, unfortunately, I was engaged in outside business at the time. The exhibition at the Armory was viewed by crowds of interested visitors, and the press devoted liberal space to it daily.

The Auditorium Theater, Chicago, was packed Sunday evening, April 5, by people who had read the advertisement of free motion pictures of biblical scenes. Incidents taken from the lives of the prophets were re-enacted on the screen to the accompaniment of a phonograph by which "Pastor" Russell, originator of the movement to teach the Bible through moving pictures, expounded his doctrines. The pictures, some of them merely still slides, presented the Bible with literal accuracy. "Pastor" Russell denounced last night, both by phonograph and pictures, the "higher critics" who would construe the Bible more freely. The exhibitions are under the auspices of the International Bible Students' association.

A notable departure from the former policy of the management of the Blue Book Magazine, published in this city, has been decided upon. Beginning with the May issue, a thirty-two page department, devoted exclusively to moving picture plays, players and personalities, will become a regular feature of the publication. The pages of the new department will be profusely illustrated with photographic studies of the players and with scenes from the bigger plays.

At both these places the Industrial Moving Picture Company will present complete moving picture programs showing every phase of the lumber industry. One of the features of the entertainment, on each occasion, will be the two-reel series, taken for the Long-Bell Lumber Company, showing lumbering in Louisiana. Other films will represent various important lumbering interests throughout the world.

Native Life in the Philippines

Twelve Parts. Pan-American.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS production has considerable educational value. It is the best medium we know of to show the American voters what their country has done in the Philippine Islands. How manfully it has shouldered the white man's burden and how, with infinite patience and toleration, it has conquered the superstitions, the evils and the crimes of savagery.

In his zeal for a complete portrayal of Philippine life, the cameraman has at times taken pictures that might well have been omitted and that, as I understand it, will be eliminated in all the films intended for the public use. Aside from this objection no fault could have been found with the performance of a great and important task.

Among other things we see how the presence of American civilization in the Philippine Islands has replaced savage warfare by rational love of sports and athletics. Such a picture as the "Dance of Peace" might well be considered worthy of being placed in our gallery of historic pictures. The scene shows representatives of all the tribes in the Philippine Islands joining in a dance of peace. This was the first time that all the savage tribes buried the hatchet and came under the influence of Christian civilization. The life of the Philippinos, their habits, are shown with great thoroughness and accuracy and are full of interest. One cannot help feeling that the Americans in sharp contrast to the Spaniards, have accepted their responsibilities towards their brown brothers and are discharging their self-imposed duties with great benefit to the objects of their care. He who sees these pictures, realizes in the most vivid manner that the Philippino is, in point of intelligence, not much below the white race, and that he is like the Japanese, amiable to kind treatment and very docile. The pictures show how the useful occupations—carpentry, house-building, etc.—are taught to the Philippino youth, and how both sexes are taught the rudiments of education. One of the most pleasing scenes in the entire series is the part which shows how the Christian idea of marriage and the permanency of the marriage bond has displaced the old bastal idea of marriage that prevailed in those islands before. As an exponent of civilizing work these pictures make a record.

"The Dance of Death"

Strong Two-Reel Kalem Subject Filled with the Charm and Atmosphere of the South Sea Islands.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE possibilities for photodrama that lie in semi-tropical Florida when they are worked out by a skillful director are demonstrated in "The Dance of Death," a dramatically strong two-reel Kalem production to be released on April 27th. It is a story of the South Sea Islands written by Phil Lang, the head of Kalem's scenario department, and produced by Robert G. Vignola. Mr. Vignola uses jungle a-plenty in his backgrounds. Undoubtedly he has been materially aided by the advice as his production has been enhanced by the participation in of Verna Mersereau, a charming, lithe and shapely dancer, who is said to bring to the picture first-hand knowledge of the customs and habits of the natives of the South Seas. Miss Mersereau, who with her mother journeyed from New York to Florida for the sole purpose of taking part in the making of this picture, is more than a dancer. That she has abundant talent for emotional portrayal will be evident to all those so fortunate as to see this subject.

The story is straightforward, simple. Richard Hartley, a well-to-do young man who cares nothing for business, is reproached by Mabel, his sweetheart, for his idle ways. He accepts an opportunity to go to the South Sea Islands as secretary to a consul.

Scene from "The Dance of Death" (Kalem).

There he falls in love with Sahki, a dancer, and in accordance with the picturesque native ceremonies is married to her. Many months later Richard gets word that his father has died and that his presence back home is imperative. He leaves Sahki and goes, despite her pleadings. Gradually he forgets his wife in the presence of Mabel. A theatrical man, on a pleasure trip, sees Sahki dancing and engages her. Just before Richard's wedding he and his fiancee attend a theater. Sahki is one of the entertainers. She discovers Richard in a box, and turns the dance of death into a reality. The husband goes to her, in time only to say good-bye. Mabel comes upon the scene and finds Richard with a baby in his arms. She realizes the situation and takes the baby from Richard.

It is not alone in his careful, skillful treatment of tense dramatic situations that Mr. Vignola does praiseworthy work; we see plainly that he is an exponent of the best and truest in dramatic art, the restrained as opposed to the demonstrative. It is also in his selection and likewise construction of backgrounds that are artistic as well as convincing that go far toward the success of this fine picture. An illustration of this is the hut where lives the grass-skirted Sahki, or the theater stage, the drawing back of the velvet curtain of which reveals a jungled setting and the wild outdoors.

Some of the best dramatic situations are of the notification of Richard of the death of his father; the bidding good-bye to the native wife; the meeting of Richard and Mabel; the dancing of Sahki on the theater stage, with Richard and Mabel in the box near by; the discovery by Sahki of the husband, in search of whom she has come to America, and Richard's recognition of his wife; the self-destruction by the wife and the tragic scenes in the little dressing-room.

Tom Moore is Richard, Alice Joyce is Mabel, and Miss Mersereau is Sahki. It is upon these that the bulk of the work falls, but there is a most competent supporting cast. There are Henry Hallam, James B. Ross and Helen Lindroth, for instance. In one of the earlier scenes we note Frank T. Montgomery, the southern exhibitor. Another figure well known at Brighton Beach as it is also in Jacksonville is that of Chiro, who takes to picture work as does a duck to water, and who carries the part of the consul. Miss Joyce plays with deep sympathy and fine feeling the difficult role that falls to her, and Mr. Moore is strong as Richard.

It is about Sahki, however, that will center the interest and the sympathy. Her graceful dancing will charm every audience. There is in it the light-hearted abandon, the naivete, of the child of the jungle, the freedom from the conventions of society, and, most important of all, the entire absence of the suggestive. Her work throughout, especially in the tragedy following the discovery of her husband, whets the curiosity to see her in straight work.

MISTAKE IN ADVERTISEMENT.

In last week's issue of the World, in the advertisement of Films Lloyd, there was a transposition in the designation of the different sizes of posters that were illustrated. In order to obviate confusion in ordering these posters, exhibitors are requested to make a note of the fact that the cut labeled six-sheet is really the one-sheet. That labeled three-sheet is the six-sheet, and that labeled one-sheet is the three-sheet.

The Eastman Kodak Exhibition

By John E. Webber.

THE coast to coast tour of the big Eastman kodak exhibition is just about completed. Two years have been spent in making the circuit. Last year the cities of the east were covered—cities like New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Providence, Montreal and Toronto. This season the circle was widened to include every first-class city as far west as the Pacific coast. Starting with Chicago, the outward route took the way of Milwaukee, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Duluth, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, Los angeles, returning by Salt Lake City, Denver, Omaha, Kansas City and St. Louis, with a little side trip down Texas way.

No better proof of the wide spread interest in amateur photography could be asked than the reception given to this kodak show everywhere. The western tour especially was a triumphal progress. Upwards of a million people, it is estimated, have seen it. Newspapers have devoted columns to it.

The Eastman Company is in a unique position for carrying out an enterprise of this kind. The entire proposition has to do with picture making. What more natural than a picture presentation of this proposition? And what better way to realize this than by assembling the actual work of actual kodakers and throwing it into a huge touring exhibit? It is a daring and brilliant idea, but precisely the thing to do, and the thing they have done with such singular success.

The kodak exhibition is a beautiful and comprehensive display of the work of amateur photographers gathered from every corner of the globe. Over thirty thousand negatives, it is said, were submitted for selection. It is by all odds the largest collection of amateur work ever assembled. It shows pictures taken under all conditions—in the sunshine, in the shadow, in fog and in rain, at noon and at night. From every clime and every country they come baring mute but eloquent testimony to the artistic heights already attained by the amateur.

The subjects, too, are as varied as the tastes and predilections of the kodakers whose activities cover the earth. There are pictures of travel, hunting scenes, fishing and outdoor sports; scenes from Alpine peaks and the plains of Arizona; home scenes that have the charm of intimate things; studies of children in every conceivable pose. Frontier life is also represented and peasant life in foreign lands. The typical American Indian is there, too, faithfully portrayed by such experts in Indian lore as Frederic I. Monsen and Dr. Joseph K. Dixon.

The work of the amateurs is shown entirely in photographic enlargements and in the lantern slides. The enlargements which form the body of the exhibit are framed and mounted on portable panels or screens, stained and draped to provide the most harmonious background for the pictures.

Some idea of the magnitude of the whole undertaking may be gathered from the fact that over thirty-five tons of properties are carried along for decorative purposes alone. With this equipment the most barren interior can be converted into an art gallery within a few hours. In other words, the company not only provides an art exhibit of extraordinary range and merit, but furnishes the appropriate atmosphere and setting for its enjoyment.

One reviewer called the exhibition "a photographer's fairyland where dreams come true." This is little or no exaggeration. The foreword in the program modestly disclaims the ambitions of a salon or even an art exhibit; yet artistically nothing more could be desired. Critics have compared some of the enlargements for pictorial beauty with the best work of the brush and palette. To thousands the entire display has proved a revelation of the possibilities of the kodak in amateur hands. This in spite of the fact that the selection was made primarily to prove the versatility and adaptability of the kodak. Simplicity is the keynote, but with this is combined a degree of mechanical finesse to satisfy the most critical. In human interest the exhibition surpassed anything of the kind ever attempted.

One example of forethought is the printing of the pictures in tones appropriate to the subject. Pastorals, for instance, where warmth of tone is desirable, are printed in rich warm sepias. Where sharp contrast is to be emphasized, black and white is the invariable medium. A particularly happy result is the printing of Anthony Fiala's Arctic group in cold blue prints. The atmospheric effect from these blue tones is almost a triumph in realism.

In addition to the huge picture display, a program of real entertainment is provided. This consists of travelogs and lectures on popular subjects, in which the usefulness and delights of picture-taking can be exemplified. The lectures are profusely illustrated with lantern slides which have also been made from amateur negatives. The kodak management has secured a very capable lecturer in Dr. William Torrence Stuchell, for many years lecturer for the New York board of education. The motion pictures used are unique in narrative and photographically quite remarkable.

"His Highness, the Prince"

Delightful Comedy Subject In Three Parts From the Great Northern—Presents Many Laugh-Making Situations.

THE enterprise of the producers and skill of the players of the Great Northern Film Company have proved that it is possible to make comedy subjects of greater length than one reel of film. Indeed, this firm does not hesitate to make three-reel comedies and, what is more to the point, it makes them interesting even to the last foot of film. One of the latest Great Northern comedies is a three-part subject entitled "His Highness, the Prince." It is real comedy, based upon a case of mistaken identity, an ever potent theme in the dramatic writer's bag of tricks, and while this particular trick has done yeoman service in picture and story for many a day, it loses not the least of its flavor when properly presented under a new guise.

In the picture in question Henry Prince, an editor, and his chum start out for a holiday. Enroute on the train Henry is mistaken for Prince Henry, whom he greatly resembles. It is Councillor Hall, a roly-poly little fellow, who makes the discovery and he hastens to advise the Mayor of Waldeck of the approach of his Highness, also advising every one on the train of the presence of royalty.

Scene from "His Highness the Prince" (Gt. Northern).

Editor Prince and his companion are at a loss to understand the cause of the great deference with which they are being treated, but decide to see the thing through. Upon arrival at Waldeck they find themselves greeted as royal persons and presently discover that Henry Prince has been taken for Prince Henry. Subsequently they are wined and dined though much to the disgust of the editor's companion, who is compelled to act as valet to "his highness".

Many amusing situations are created, affording opportunity for numerous laughs; in fact there is scarcely a foot of the picture that could be termed dull. The fun goes merrily on until news of the affair reaches the real Prince Henry. His Highness proceeds at once to Waldeck to discover who it is that is impersonating him and catches the culprits red handed. Demanding an explanation he gets the story of the escapade of the newspaper man and his chum and enjoys it so thoroughly that he forgives them upon the one condition that Henry Prince, the editor, shall always retain his mustache which distinguishes him from Prince Henry.

As a gracious prince and good fellow should, Prince Henry makes good all the obligations of his double and the incident is closed.

This picture was given a trial exhibition at Fox's Audubon theater, New York, last week, and was received with unusual applause by a large and discriminating audience.

PLANNING NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Executive Committee of National League Holds Enthusiastic Meeting at Dayton and Completes Arrangements.

AN enthusiastic meeting of the executive committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America was held at Dayton, O., on Monday, April 6, and completed arrangements for the fourth annual convention of the league and the Second Annual Exposition of Motion Picture Art, to be held in Dayton during the week commencing July 6. Secretary Wiley reports that all local commercial organizations have put their shoulders to the wheel and that arrangements have been made with the passenger traffic associations to give reduced rates for the event.

That wide spread interest has been awakened in the convention and exposition is evident by the large number of hotel reservations that have already been recorded and that over half of the space in the exposition hall has been sold. Word from California comes to the effect that 50 exhibitors will be present from the coast and general indications are that the attendance of exhibitors will break all records.

The Dayton Local of the Exhibitors' League has appointed the following committees to co-operate with the national committee for the event:

NEW YORK EXPOSITION.

Space at Grand Central Palace Nearly All Taken—Big Exposition Is Now assured.

FOLLOWING the success of the First International Exposition of Motion Picture Art, held under the auspices of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, at Grand Central Palace, New York City, last year, the New York City Exhibitors' Association, in conjunction with the International Exposition Company, are making great progress with the project to give another motion picture exposition at the same place during the week of June 8 to 13, this year. Already sufficient space has been sold to insure the success of the undertaking and, it is hoped, with the aid of the large available public centered in New York City, to make the institution a permanent one.

The advantage of holding expositions of this character in New York City is apparent to every one who seeks to interest the general public in their particular product. Makers of motion pictures will find expositions of this kind of the greatest value from the publicity point of view and will doubtless take advantage of the opportunity; in fact, space has already been taken by nearly all manufacturers in the vicinity of New York.

An effort is being made to secure a large attendance of exhibitors on this occasion and many will, no doubt, be attracted by the exposition. It is announced that there will be a convention which will be open to all exhibitors. The Grand Central Palace will be appropriately decorated for the occasion and there will be many features to interest the trade. Motion picture theaters will be run as last year and, in addition, there will be a fully equipped studio where pictures will be produced just as in a regular studio. Later these productions will be shown in one of the theaters.

KANSAS STATE CONVENTION.

Changes In Officers Made and Methods for Increasing Membership Discussed.

THREE of the old officers of the Kansas branch of the M. P. E. L. of A., resigned at the semi-annual meeting of the state organization held at Salina on March 24th and 25th. All of the changes came as surprises, as the election of officers was not expected to come up until the annual meeting, to be held at Kansas City, Kan., on a date not yet designated. Jack Brainerd, of Erie, tendered his resignation as president, because of ill health in his family. W. B. Moore, of Galena, was elected president in Mr. Brainerd's stead. Vice-President C. E. Glamann, of Wellington, also resigned, and was succeeded by Archie Blue, of Salina. Secretary George McCrum, of Kansas City, Kan., dropped out, and was succeeded by B. J. Connon, of Emporia. Mr. McCrum, who has been secretary of the Kansas organization since its formation slightly over two years back, will shortly enter business in Kansas City, Mo., as manager of the World Theater, in which, however, National Secretary George H. Wiley will retain an interest, though not the active management. Mr. Wiley, as announced at the semi-annual meeting of the Missouri league recently, will make his headquarters in the east in the future.

The Salina gathering was fairly well attended, thirty exhibitors and a dozen exchanges being represented. The meeting was called to order in the spacious committee room of the city hall. One of the first subjects brought up was that of posters. It was stated that under present conditions, some exchanges distribute posters without charge, while others make the exhibitors pay for them. The Kansas organization went on record as favoring payment for posters, and the adoption of uniform methods by film exchanges.

It was stated that a number of towns in Kansas are working for local censorship. There is at present a state law in Kansas providing for inspection of films by a board to be appointed by the Governor. The organization's sentiment was distinctly unfavorable to local or state censorship. No resolutions to this effect were adopted, however.

A banquet at the National Hotel ended the proceedings of the opening day. R. K. Jamison, secretary of the Salina Commercial Club, was one of the speakers of note at the dinner, "Co-operation and Organization" being his subject. Mr. Jamison did not confine himself to generalities and the Kansas exhibitors were so deeply impressed with his talk that they adopted resolutions asking Mr. Jamison to reduce his speech to writing that it might be reproduced by Kansas papers. Other speakers at the meeting were C. S. Edwards and R. V. Rothermel, head of the service and feature departments, respectively, of the General Film Company, with headquarters at Kansas City.

Two private sessions were held on Wednesday, the second day of the meeting, the exhibitors discussing methods of stimulating attendance at future conventions and other subjects. Most of the day was devoted to social activity. The exhibitors were taken over the city in automobiles, inspecting all points of interest. The Country Club was one of these, while the high-grade business establishments also received attention. All of the motion picture houses in Salina were visited. Exhibitors of the city anticipated the inspection by decorating their theaters elaborately. Moving pictures of the exhibitors were made by the Faidely Moving Picture Company, of Wichita, Kan.

A smoker, at which film exchanges played hosts, was staged on Wednesday night, being the concluding feature of the Kansas convention. The General, Mutual and Universal were three of the best-known companies to tender their hospitality to the exhibitors. Others who participated were the Kansas City Feature Film Company, of Kansas City, Kan., and Olson Brothers Film Company, of Wichita, Kan. It was decided to hold the annual meeting of the convention in Kansas City, Kan., some time in the early fall. MURRAY.

NEW YORK LOCAL LEAGUE MEETING.

Big Gathering of City Members of National Organization to be Held at Hunt's Point Palace, in the Bronx.

On Tuesday evening, at 11 o'clock P. M., there will be a big meeting of the members of the New York Local No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, at Hunt's Point Palace, Southern Boulevard and 163d Street, Bronx, for the purpose of completing the organization and the election of permanent officers. As an added attraction there will be served an excellent collation—plenty of eatables and drinkables. The committee in charge will spare neither pains nor expense to make everybody comfortable.

The importance of this meeting cannot be emphasized too greatly. The time for the State and National conventions of the National League is approaching and New York City should have a good representation at those meetings. To secure a proper standing the organization of the New York Local must be completed. Co-operation of those who are already members of the league will go far to secure the desired results.

All exhibitors who are desirous of becoming members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and are prepared to present their applications at this meeting are invited to attend. Official announcement of the meeting has been issued by Secretary Fleischman. President John J. Wittman will preside at the meeting. Don't fail to attend if you are interested in the welfare of the business.

DISCUSSING A PENNSYLVANIA LAW.

At the regular Friday meeting of the Philadelphia Local, M. P. E. L., the new State Building Code and Standards for Motion Picture Theaters was discussed. The set of standards is being compiled by the Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry and is expected to be enacted into law at the next session of the Legislature. In order that the picture interests should be represented, Commissioner John Price Jackson named the following committee to confer with him: Edgar A. Weimer, State Building Code Commission, Lebanon; W. C. Beatty, Pittsburgh Exhibitors' League; Samuel F. Wheeler, Philadelphia Exhibitors' League; S. B. Dies, Chief of the Bureau of Building Inspection, Pittsburgh; Chief Clark, Bureau of Building Inspection, Philadelphia; W. H. Hoffman, architect, Philadelphia; W. T. Stewart, American Seating Company, Philadelphia; C. Harry Kain and Maxwell H. Hite, engineers, Harrisburg; John H. Walker and Lew R. Palmer, Department of Labor and Industry, Harrisburg. Mr. Palmer was elected chairman.

The committee has met once and formulated tentative standards, which will be submitted to all parties interested and suggestions for changes will be forwarded to the Commissioner.

ALBANY EXHIBITORS LOSE.

The decision of Judge Brady of Albany in the Star-McDermott case, involving the question of whether the law allowed the motion picture theaters to open on Sundays, has been decided adversely to the contention of the picture men. Judge Brady holds that the motion picture entertainment is practically a dramatic show and that it disturbs the peace and order of the community and is therefore unlawful on the first day of the week. It is said that the exhibitors will not rest here but will appeal to the Appellate Division.

CHICAGO EXHIBITORS' BALL.

W. J. Sweeney, Harry Hyman and Samuel Katz, a committee from the Chicago Exhibitors' Association, were in New York last week for the purpose of securing a few added attractions in the way of famous photoplayers for the first annual ball and reception to be given on May 14th, at Coliseum Hall, Chicago, by the Chicago exhibitors. The committee received assurances from the Vitagraph, Edison, Famous Players, the Mutual, the Universal and other companies that a number of their representative players would attend the event.

The committee returned to Chicago on Friday, well pleased with the result of their trip.

OHIO CENSORS RESUME WORK.

The State Board of Censors, idle since December, has resumed its work. The State Industrial Commission decided the censors should continue following the decision of the Federal Court in Cleveland, unholding the censorship law. Another censor will be appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of J. W. Maddox, of Columbus. Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, of Columbus, and Harry Vestal, of Ada, the two remaining members, are at work.

Several other states, Kansas in particular, will be affected by the decision, Attorney-General Hogan, of Ohio, said after hearing the decision. A law similar to the Ohio statute had been questioned in Kansas and the case there was delayed by Attorney-General Dawson pending the decision in Ohio. RARIDAN.

COMPOSITE PHOTOPLAYS.

Five Companies of Players Unite to Make Pictures for the Confederate Reunion at Jacksonville.

Something unusual is doing in the picture world down in Jacksonville, Fla. A reunion of Confederate veterans is due to be held there in the near future and the citizens are busy raising funds for the event. Among the many schemes suggested to aid in swelling the entertainment fund was one proposed by Frank T. Montgomery, the picture theater man, that two motion pictures be made especially suited to the occasion and that the proceeds of the exhibition be turned into the fund. The idea caught on strong and the members of the five different producing companies immediately volunteered their services to make the pictures.

After conferring with the picture committee, of which Mr. Montgomery is chairman, it was decided that Arthur Hotaling, of the Lubin Company, should write at least one of the scenarios and that another would be written by some local author. Among those taking part in the production are C. J. Williams, Edison director; Robert Vignola and Kenean Buell, Kalem directors, and Sidney Olcott. More than a hundred players now working near Jacksonville will take part in the pictures, which will be run first in Jacksonville and then sent through the south.

The accompanying cartoon was published in the Florida Metropolis, one of the leading papers of Jacksonville.

"THE HINDU NEMESIS" (Master Producers).

This is the first release of the Master Producers' Film Company, and is a new offering in an entirely new vein. The idea and theory of this picture is based upon a special story written by Mr. Harry E. Piel.

The production is in four parts and the plot has been particularly adopted to appeal to all classes of amusement lovers. There are beautiful settings, classic presentations, and masterful sensations.

HORKHEIMER IN NEW YORK.

H. M. Horkheimer, president and general manager of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, manufacturers of "Balboa Feature Films," is at the Astor Hotel, New York, having recently arrived from Long Beach, California. Mr. Horkheimer is negotiating with prominent exchange men to handle the Balboa Feature Films on exclusive state rights plan and reports having closed most satisfactory contracts to that end. Mr. Horkheimer shortly leaves for London, England, and will arrange with a prominent firm in that city to handle the Balboa Feature Film products throughout Europe and foreign countries.

UNIQUE EXCHANGE OPENING.

Probably the first man to go on record as having opened a new exchange with a dance and reception is N. E. Depinet, manager of the new branch of the Consolidated Film & Supply Company, Inc., at Dallas, Tex. On Saturday, March 7, the gala affair took place in the new home of the aforementioned company, the formal opening of the exchange being on Monday, March 9. The happy idea was competently and successfully handled by J. B. Kelly, traveling representative of the company, and N. E. Depinet, who constituted the entertainment committee.

The quarters of the company, which take up the entire second floor of the new building at 1900 Commerce Street, were tastefully decorated with cut flowers, palms and other greenery. Many of Mr. Depinet's friends and business associates expressed their appreciation of his efforts by contributing a large number of beautiful floral offerings.

Over 50 couples tripped the light fantastic to music furnished by a five-piece orchestra, and there were many exemplifications of expert terpsichore. Light refreshments were served.

Among those present were William Oldknow, vice president of the Consolidated Company, whose headquarters are in Atlanta, Ga.; J. E. Phillips, former president of the Texas State branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; C. C. Ezell, manager of the Dallas branch of the General Film Company; C. T. Touchon, manager of Warner's Features; Albert Russell, manager of C. T. Touchon, the Southern Feature Film Company; F. M. Sanford, of the World Films Corporation; E. T. Peter, of the Texas Feature Film Company; R. D. Thrash, of the R. D Thrash Film Company; E. H. Hulsey, of the Queen Theater circuit; G. K. Jorgensen, of the Crystal Theater circuit; Roy F. Dalton, of the Dalton circuit, and many others too numerous to mention.

Everybody enjoyed themselves to their hearts' content, and the festive event did not come to an end until the small wee hours of the following day.

CORBETT STARTS SUPPLY HOUSE.

Bernard M. Corbett, one of the best known machine salesmen in the country, resigned his position as sales manager of the machine and supply department of the General Film Company, at their Boston office last week, to engage in the moving picture machine and supply business for himself under the name of Corbett Theater Equipment Company, at No. 611 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Corbett is widely known among the trade, having been traveling representative for Thomas A. Edison, Inc., for many years in which position he represented his company at all of the big conventions and gatherings of the moving picture people. He left his position with the Edison company January 18, 1913, to go to Chicago, and later became the Eastern representative for The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, makers of the Motiograph machine, which position he held until July of last year, when he resigned to take charge of the machine and supply department of the General Film Company. Mr. Corbett has been in the motion picture business almost from its beginning, entering it as an office boy for "Pop" Lubin, at Philadelphia, in July, 1898, and having been engaged in every branch of the trade he is well qualified to successfully carry on his present undertaking.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir:—Enclosed find check for $3 for the World for 1914, as I am like any one in the moving picture business, they can't afford to miss a copy of the World. I can't afford for mine to be late, and the only kick I have to make is that it is sometimes a day late and I get anxious for it and realize its value more. Yours truly,

Opening of the Strand

New York's Newest Theater For Pictures a Vast and Ornate Structure—To Be Managed By S. L. Rothapfel.

By W. Stephen Bush.

DURING the past two weeks hundreds of workmen have been toiling day and night to bring to completion the widely heralded motion picture theater, The Strand, an imposing and beautiful structure at 47th Street and Broadway, New York, scheduled to throw open its doors to the public on the evening of Saturday, April 11th. When the writer visited the scene of activity, masons, electricians, carpenters, decorators and workers of all kinds were still in a seething swirl of effort in every part of the huge edifice, and it seemed quite probable that The Strand would blaze forth its electric greetings on Broadway on scheduled time, and through Broadway to the world.

They are master builders at The Strand, not merely in the way of the architect and the designer, but in a larger and more significant way. They not only know how to build structures, but they know how to please the thousands once they have accepted the hospitable welcome of more than 3,000 seats.

It is a million-dollar enterprise promoted by the Mitchel H. Marks Realty Company. One cannot stand in the center of the grea: theater and gaze at its marvels of beauty and comfort and light and color without feeling a thrill of joy. It does indeed mean something to the art and industry at large that a group of men of affairs have erected such a costly monument of their faith in the future of motion pictures.

Whoever enters this theater from any side or whoever sits in any of the 3,000 seats is impressed with one fact immediately: Here is a triumphant combination of comfort and vastness of ease and strength of luxury and safety. There are no bad seats in any part of the house. I was conducted to what a distinguished committee of reception alluded as the worst seat in the house, and I have never sat in a better. As one stands in the aisle dividing the first from the second balcony, one realizes how close the stage is even to the furthest seats, and this impression grows rather than diminishes as one walks from the first balcony to the second. No matter for what parts of the house you buy your ticket, you never have to climb until you are tired.

The splendors of the lobby, chaste in their classic beauty, are impressive. Whoever made the designs for the lobby had a keen sense of art, and what is more, knew how to apply it practically in a modern structure. A handsomely-finished hall, with a superb lattice effect on the ceiling, divides the lobby from the theater proper. Even in its present state, cluttered with ladders, boards and scaffolds and paint pots, one can distinguish and appreciate the lines of beauty as they were bodied forth from the mind of the designer.

The most original arrangement strikes the idea of the beholder upon entering the theater proper. It is a rotunda, or, more properly speaking, a loop sufficiently wide for promenaders. From this open loop or arcade, constructed after the best models of its kind, a glimpse can be had at all times of the audience below, and it is safe to predict that promenading around the loop in the intermissions will be one of the popular things at The Strand. Advancing in the direction of the stage the effect of this extraordinary solidity of construction and beauty of design is overwhelming. If the architect intended to give at once a sense of compactness and a sense of hugeness to the beholder he has succeeded in the most satisfactory manner. There are three organs in the theater back of the stage and experts on acoustics, which is the science of sound, have been busy for many days in arranging and placing the organs in such a way as to get every bit of real music to the ear of the audience. The curtain is of golden fiber variety and the picture will be 18 x 22 feet in size. It is difficult to see how a more appropriate size could be selected. The throw is 154 feet. Three Simplex machines and an extraordinary number of devices guarding against every emergency are provided.

The day of the opening will, of course, bring the final test of projection, but it is safe to predict that the quality of projection will equal the quality of all the rest.

The opening night bids fair to establish not only new records for attendance, but new records for the science of exhibition. Here is a theater in which a master exhibitor like Rothapfel can do himself full justice. Here is a theater in which the film of quality will get its proper frame and housing. Here is a theater in which motion picture music will be able to record new triumphs. Here is a theater in which the human voice can most tellingly be enlisted in aid of the motion picture entertainment. Here, in fine, is the ideal temple of the motion picture art.

The architect of The Strand Theater is Thomas W. Lamb, who has built a great number of the newest theaters in New York. He was architect of the Regent, the Hamilton, William Fox's Audobon, nearly all of Loew's houses and a number of lesser structures. The Strand is his largest undertaking. It is built with a view to accommodating regular theatrical productions, possessing a full stage equipment and numerous dressing-rooms for the players. The stage is 110 feet wide and 40 feet deep with a proscenium opening of 42 feet—as commodious as any theater in New York aside from the Hippodrome.

The general decorative scheme is ivory and gold with panels of embossed red plush, columns and balustrades of imitation marble, giving a beautiful effect under the lights. The seats are large and comfortable, covered with red plush and were furnished by the American Seating Company.

The Strand has been leased for exhibition purposes by the Mark-Brock Enterprises, which company operates motion picture houses in Toronto and Ottawa, Canada, and Buffalo, N. Y.

The management of The Strand will be in the competent hands of S. L. Rothapfel, well known to readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Arthur Warde, recently with George Kleine, is the publicity manager. Selig's famous production, "The Spoilers" will be the feature of the opening program.

Admission prices will be 10 cents, 15 cents and 25 cents for seats in the body of the house. Box and loge seats will be 50 cents.

COL. McCARAHAN BUYING FEATURES.

F. C. McCarahan, of the Superior Feature Film Company, Chicago, is spending a few weeks in New York looking over the stock of feature pictures on hand with a view to buying something good to start his campaign. Mr. McCarahan can be reached at the Long Acre Hotel. He is looking for something of extraordinary character for the initial release of his company. Feature film dealers will do well to get in touch with him.

"Life in the Holy Land"

Holy Land Exhibition Company Offers a Seven-Part Feature of Singular Interest.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is, in the fullest sense of the word, an epochal picture because it demonstrates two things: first, the work that has been done by the modern Jews in Palestine, and, second, the impressive power of motion picture portrayal. Few people knew that for the last thirty-two years the movement among the Jews of the world to reestablish their ancient home and dominion in the Holy Land has made any considerable progress, but these pictures leave no room for either doubt or ignorance. While the work is, of course, particularly interesting to the Jews, as it attests the eternal vitality of their race, its appeal is by no means confined to one nation or one creed, and it would be difficult to think of a finer educational entertainment for even the general public than is afforded by these pictures.

The early part shows the departure of new Jewish colonists from Odessa, Russia, to Jaffe and glimpses of the city of Constantinople, the Dardanelles and the port of Smyrna. Entering the Holy Land proper, by way of Jaffe, we come upon the first new Jewish colony which is near Jaffe and is called Tel-Aviv. While nominally under the sovereignty of the Turkish Empire, Tel-Aviv and all other Jewish colonies in Palestine have been granted a very large measure of self-government, and these pictures show a Jewish Municipal Council in session. There is a fine view of the Hebrew High School in Jaffe and the splendid work done by the leading spirits in this work of colonization in caring both for the mental and physical training of the pupils. There follow a number of these colonies, peopled by Jews from various parts of the world and we get a glimpse of the work on the farms and in the vineyards, orange and almond groves, making of honey, etc. One cannot help remembering the language of the Bible, "The land overflowing with milk and honey." The colonists are engaged both in cattle raising and in agriculture, and even our own middle west can show little more in the way of agricultural efficiency than these colonists who employ mostly modern implements and machinery. All through the picture are scattered spots that have become enshrined in the memory of mankind such as the grave of Moses Maimonides, the Tomb of Rachael, the Grotto of Sampson, the Grave of the San-hedrins, the Tombs of the Prophets, the City of Hebron, the Grave of the Patriarchs, the Springs of Solomon, the old city of Jerusalem, the Dead Sea, superb views of the River Jordan, etc. Not the least interesting pictures were those showing the Yemenite Jews, a name which is given to the Jewish natives of Turkey, whose ancestors never left the Holy Land. These Yemenite Jews show a very fine Semitic type and form a most interesting contrast to the descendants of the Jews in strange countries.

The Wailing Wall at Jerusalem.

There is a fine view of the Lake of Tiberias, associated with immortal memories in the minds of both Jew and Gentile. Interest, of course, centers on the views of Jerusalem, and here at times the scenes on the films inspire one with awe and reverence. A very distinct and prolonged view of the "Wall of Wailing" is displayed, and the pathos of this sight is irresistible. We also see David's Tower, the Asylum for the Lepers and the Mosque of Omar, said to stand on the site of the ancient Temple of Solomon. The pictures conclude with a portrayal of a celebration in one of the colonies on the occasion of the 30th anniversary of the pioneers of Jewish colonists in Palestine. It would be impossible to do justice to these pictures without at least mentioning briefly the splendid army of young Jews of the second generation called the Maccabees who are trained to the minute by military experts.

The title, "Life in the Holy Land," is well justified by the pictures, but it is the duty of the reviewer to note that only a part of the Holy Land has been reproduced in these films. Nazareth and Bethlehem have been omitted entirely, while of Galilee we get only a distant and fleeting glimpse.

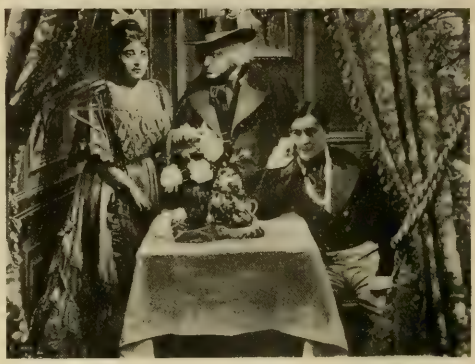
"The Master Criminal"

World Film Corporation's Four-Part Subject Contains a Strong Portrayal of Balzac's Story.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE World Film Corporation's four-part adaptation of Balzac's story is marked by fine acting on the part of the entire cast. Standing out is the work of Mr. Acquilliere, who will be recognized by picturegoers as the famous Zigomar. "The Master Criminal" was produced by the Paris Eclair company, and among the players are some of the Eclair's best. Renee Sylvaire is Virginia, the daughter of the relentless Detective Corentin, portrayed by Mr. Gouget. Mr. Guido is Lucien and Marise Dauvray is Esther, two lovers separated by the master criminal who separately go to self-destruction because of inability to throw off the yoke of Collin, twice-escaped convict.

Collin, played by Mr. Aquilliere, is a man who dominates others. His powers are always on the side of evil, never on the side of good. Collin, so far as may be discoverable, has but one saving characteristic, and that is his affection for his aunt, Jacqueline, who poses as an honest woman but in reality is a crook. Collin is a fascinating character; he fascinates the spectator as he hypnotizes his victims, and it is by reason of his personality alone. A striking example of this forcefulness occurs in the second part when he comes upon young Lucien, just on the brink through remorse over his gambling losses. Collin, over the shoulder of the desperate man, reads the note which Lucien intends shall be his last. Quietly he destroys the paper, and linking his arm in that of Lucien leads him out of the room—a slave.



Scene from "The Master Criminal" (World Film).

The story interests from the first, which shows the escape of Collin from prison. We see him at work with a pick, then his cutting of the leg bonds that bind him, his overpowering of the inside watch, and the throwing over the high wall of the musketed outside guard. Then by means of a rope he lets himself down a great cliff and swims to a waiting boat. There are splendidly staged ensembles, one of a dance and two others of restaurants. The conclusion will strike some as illogical, in spite of the fact that it indicates the transformation of Collin and the application of his undoubted great talents to the interests of society. Collin, for the third time under arrest, i soffered the position of chief of detectives if he will surrender documents that compromise a noble family. He accepts the proffer. Everybody seems happy over the denouement, even Corentin, whom he supersedes.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE WEDDING PRESENT" (Kleine-Cines).

A strong, fascinating plot, ingeniously devised and excellently portrayed, makes this one of the most interesting two-reel subjects yet offered to exhibitors by the Kleine-Cines combination, sponsors of "Quo Vadis?" and "Antony and Cleopatra." It will be released through the General Film Company, April 26. Both parts are full of exciting scenes, one of the most noteworthy of which is a sensational race between an automobile full of detectives and a clever criminal on a high-powered motorcycle, a race which ends in the total wreck of the latter machine.

Scene from "The Wedding Present" (Kleine-Cines).

A young girl is brought face to face with the alternative of exposing the criminal operations of her wayward brother or allowing her lover to be punished for a serious crime. A clever detective and a slender clue help her to solve her problem. No detail which could possibly contribute to the fascination of the story has been overlooked by the "Cines" producers, and the various roles are splendidly handled by several of Europe's most popular photoplayers. The settings and photography are fully up to the high standard of excellence set by previous Kleine releases.

PICTURES AS AID TO FOREIGN SELLING.

From Consular Trade Reports.

An enterprising firm in Hull, England, making oil-mill and other machinery for export, has a "private picture palace" for showing its machinery in operation under various circumstances. The firm finds this particularly valuable in entertaining foreign customers who want to see how the machinery is employed in actual practice. It is much simpler and actually more effective to show the moving pictures than showing the customers through the mills, even when such a course is possible. It obviates the often unpleasant necessity for asking permission of customers who had bought machinery to show prospective customers through their mills. An important variation on this scheme is to send the films abroad, with or without a salesman, for the benefit of customers who might never have an opportunity to see the actual operation of the machinery in other countries.

LOOKING THE EUROPEAN MARKET OVER.

Mr. Joseph Klotz, the treasurer of the True Feature Company, has recently sailed for Europe to look around for first-class attractions specially suitable for the American market. He will return before the first of June. He sailed on the same ship with Mr. Winik and the friends of the two men gave them a rousing "send-off."

"THE GODFATHER" (Reliance).

The enduring love for the girl he lost of The Man Who Lost Out is the feature of the story. The Man Who Lost Out gamely stands godfather to the baby boy of the girl and The Man Who Won, and, leaving a signet ring as a gift for his godson, goes west.

As the boy is growing to manhood, the Man Who Won, victim of dissipation, dies. The son promises to follow rapidly in the footsteps of the father, and obsessed by the gambling fever, quickly spends his patrimony. He, too, goes west, leaving his mother alone.

In the west, the youth becomes an habitue of gambling halls, spending most of his time in one operated by The Man Who Lost Out, who is, of course, unknown to the youthful spendthrift. Losing what little money he has, the young man tries cheating as a means of repleting his bankroll. He is caught, and the infuriated men against whom he has been playing, lead him to the nearest tree to dispense typical western justice.

Scene from "The Godfather" (Reliance).

The gambler, The Man Who Lost Out, follows the angry miners and cowmen to the scene of the intended execution. Underneath the tree the unfortunate youth pleads for his life with outstretched arms, and, as he does so, The Man Who Lost Out sees on his finger the signet ring which he left years before, with the girl he lost, to be worn by his godson. Through his influence with the men of the western town, he saves his godson from death.

The two renounce the gaming tables and leave together for the east. Once more in the old home town, The Man Who Lost Out wins in his second suit for the hand of the girl he lost and makes a new home for the girl and his wayward godson.

ST. PATRICK FEATURE A HIT WITH CARDINAL.

The four-part feature picture, "The Life of St. Patrick," which is being shown before patriotic Irish and Catholic societies in various parts of the country by Phil. P. Benedict, was exhibited at Loyola College, Baltimore, Md., on the afternoon of April 1. Cardinal Gibbons, being advised of the exhibition, walked a block through pouring rain to the exhibition hall expressly to see the pictures, and remained all through the show, enjoying it immensely. The Cardinal is eighty years old, but the dampness of the weather had no effect upon his ardor. After the exhibition the Cardinal spoke in flattering terms of the value of the motion picture as an educator and expressed himself as delighted with "The Life of St. Patrick."

Mr. Benedict, the owner of this feature, reports that he has been very successful in booking it among Irish Catholic societies and that the picture has been well received whereever shown.

TO PRODUCE "MANON LESCAUT."

Arthur Takes Cavalieri and Muratore, Together With Their Photoplay Company, to France for Big Production.

Lina Cavalieri, famous Italian diva and beauty, left for Havre on the France last Wednesday, to enact in France the magnificent photoplay production of Abbe Prevost's immortal love romance, "Manon Lescaut." The noted beauty was accompanied by Lucien Muratore, the celebrated French tenor and Daniel V. Arthur, managing director of the Playgoers Film Company, who was fortunate enough to secure the services of Mme. Cavalieri and Mons. Muratore for their debut in motion picture representations, together with a company of twenty-five players. After Cavalieri and Muratore have posed for such scenes in Paris and other places in France as are called for in Prevost's story, Mr. Arthur will transport his company back to New York and immediately proceed to New Orleans, where the final scenes will be taken.

Altogether Cavalieri and her company will travel more than 10,000 miles in order to enact the various scenes in Prevost's great tragedy in the precise locales designated by the author.

WANTS TO WORK IN PICTURES AGAIN.

Captain Jack Bonavita is anxious to get back into the picture game, according to a dispatch just received from Tampa, Fla., where he has been working his lions during the winter months. As a lion tamer and trainer of wild animals, Bonavita has been in a class by himself for many years. When he was with the great Bostock arena at Dreamland, Coney Island, Bonavita worked thirty-seven savage lions at one time and in one cage. He is the only man in the world to have performed this feat. It was during this engagement that Bonavita was attacked by Brutus, an untamable forest-bred lion, and had his right arm so badly mangled that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. About a year ago Brutus made a second attack and it was feared for a time that the intrepid trainer would lose his one remaining arm as a result.

Last summer, while Bonavita was putting on a jungle scene for a motion picture concern, the lion again pounced upon him. Bonavita put up a heroic fight and succeeded in beating the animal off, but was so badly torn that he was laid up in a hospital for several months. In spite of all this Bonavita has gone right ahead taming lions and producing wild animal acts, accomplishing with his one arm feats which other trainers would not attempt. Bonavita is famous all over the world. He has lost none of his confidence or skill, and should prove a valuable asset to any film concern which uses wild animals in its productions.

"MISS NOBODY FROM NOWHERE" (Imp).

In this two-reel drama we have Miss Ethel Grandin, the popular little ingenue of the Imp company, featured in a role especially written for her by Monte M. Katterjohn, scenario editor of the Eastern Universal company. We feel confident that Miss Grandin has not had a role more suited to her—one that allows her more opportunity to disclose her delicate charms, her marked emotional powers and the delightful humor that she is possessed of. It is a melodrama first and last; there is a thrill and grip of swift moving action and cleverly wrought climaxes, and yet every scene possesses humanness with that reflection of humor that counteracts any bitterness that may be left by reason of the tragic note in some of the scenes.

Scene from "Miss Nobody From Nowhere" (Imp).

Ray Smallwood is the director of the play. He has made those scenes which represent the underworld in which we first find our little heroine, throb with realism. Then we are taken into a modern dancing school and here again we live with the characters, learning all the modern and difficult steps that the heroine uses to conquer the "White Way" with. Then there is the stage and the strong lights. The contrasts are keen and the heart-interest is appealing. In fact it is a play to strike deep into the interest of everyone who witness it—one that makes you think, and yet at the same time leaves a pleasant taste in your mouth—pleasant reflections.

MITTENTHAL FEATURES.

The Mittenthal Film Company, Inc., which has established itself as a big producer of features is now offering several four-reel subjects to state right buyers. The titles of these features are, "The Human Bloodhound," "The Red Flame of Passion," "Facing the Gattling Guns" and "The Tower of Terror." It has just completed a six reeler, "The Poison Needle," a story taken from life, that is soon to be produced in a Broadway theater. The company's offices are located in the Knickerbocker Theater Building, 1402 Broadway, New York.

"THE LAST SUPPER" (American).

A two-part American "Flying A" subject produced by Lorimer Johnston. Somewhat out of the realm of the American company's subjects, nevertheless, it is handled in a very apt manner and much credit is due the American for so able a production. The photographic and technical qualities are of the best.

Scene from "The Last Supper" (American).

The story is a beautiful presentation of the sermon on the mount with exposition of some of the commandments, concluding with the Last Supper and scenes of Christ and the disciples. The theme is somewhat modernized by the application of the teachings of Christ to present conditions and life. Christ walking on the waters of Galilee is strikingly presented.

Sydney Ayres takes the part of Christ in a most dignified manner. Other "Flying A" leads are prominently identified.

"A MAN FOR A' THAT" (Essanay).

"A Man For A' That," released by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, on April 24th, gives Francis X. Bushman a different character entirely—in fact it is the first time that he has played the role of a wealthy clubman seeking pleasure and character in the tenement district of a large city. The story is interesting, having the necessary human interest situations that will appeal to all.

Scene from "A Man For A' That" (Essanay).

Ruth Stonehouse as the poor girl—a part she has so often played, plays it beautifully. The story concerns a rich clubman who is engaged to a society butterfly. He tires of society's whirl and determines to find pleasure among the poor. He meets with a newsboy who helps a cripple. This gives him an idea and he dons the clothes of a laboring man—is helped by Dick, the newsboy, and consequently falls in love with his sister. It is not a shock to him to learn later that the girl he was engaged to had eloped with a nobleman. This left the way clear for the clubman to marry the girl of his heart and of the tenements. The photography is excellent and portrayal of characters splendid.

"THE DISASTER IN SHAFT 19" (Warner's Feature).

There is something fascinating about the life of the men who toil underground that the world's inhabitants may have heat, light and power.

As its title implies—"The Disaster in Shaft 19," is a gripping story of a great tragedy enacted hundreds of feet below the earth's surface. The tragic scenes are somewhat relieved by the charming romance of the mine owner's daughter and the brave mining engineer who risks the fire-damp in shaft 19 to save his employer from ruin.

This feature production introduces the oxygen helmet and the electric head light, now worn by rescuers when penetrating gaseous mine workings. Numerous thrills are provided by the descent of the courageous engineer into the abandoned shaft, and his efforts to blast his way out when he finds himself a prisoner, due to the treachery of a rival suitor for the hand of the mine owner's daughter.

Many surprising things happen to father and daughter between the time of the engineer's disappearance and the firing of the dynamite cartridge that opens a path for his escape. All in all, this production is so distinctly unusual as to cause considerable comment.

"STRENGTH OF FAMILY TIES" (Lubin).

This is a problem play of the most intense quality written by that talented U. P. College boy Shannon Fife. The key note is the misfortune of a husband and father, too fond of the white lights and neglecting his family. Death of the worthy wife and loss of the baby girl are the fearful consequences which take many years to atone. Melodramatic situations follow in rapid succession until a happy denouement brings light life and happiness to the sufferers in the story. Lloyd Carleton, who favors sad stories, has made a beautifully pathetic picture and one eminently in favor of Ormi Hawley, his beautiful and emotional leading lady. Richard Morris, Edward J. Peil and Mary Cecil are prominent in the cast, which is one of the best of the Lubin studio.

MARCO EYE PROTECTOR FOR M. P. OPERATORS.

The Marco Eye Protector, invented specially for moving picture operators, by Marks Brothers, Chicago, embodies all their requirements demanded from any eye protector to meet with the approval of operators. It affords perfect ventilation, protects the eyes without the necessity of covering them, rests the eyes and does not require to be cleaned. It is also guaranteed for one year.

This eye protector is the result of three years of experimenting to evolve an eye protector thoroughly adapted for use by moving picture operators.

The inventor also claims for the Marco Eye Protector that it will protect the eyes as no glass protector can, always keeping them in a healthy and normal condition, and ridding them of the aches which an evening's operating brings to most operators.

GOLD MEDAL FOR BRAVERY.

"Teddy" Salamon Receives Recognition from the Universal For Timely Act.

THEODORE SALAMON, known to his hosts of friends in the moving picture business as "Teddy, the Universal Operator," was the recipient of a gold medal last week from the officers of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. The presentation was made in the Universal projection room on Friday afternoon, Feb. 27, before an assemblage of the employees of the general offices of the company in the Mecca Building, New York City.

Obverse Side.

General Manager J. C. Graham issued an order that the employees assemble in the projection room at 4:45 o'clock, but in order to make the affair as great a surprise as possible, the object of the meeting was kept secret. Even Teddy himself, thought that the purpose of the gathering was to have a group photograph taken of the Universalites. At 5 o'clock, however, Mr. Graham revealed the secret that he had to disclose.

"It was the fortune of President Laemmle and some of the other officers of the company," he began, "recently, not only to become acquainted with, but to really see, an act which happened among our employees, in which one of them showed by his act that he thought first, last and all the time, of the Universal, and not of himself. We considered that this was a very commendable trait, and that if we could all work toward that end, and if the employees all knew that Mr. Laemmle and the rest of the officers of the company watches such enthusiasm, the Universal would be benefited, and we would all work more happily together."

Reverse Side.

Mr. Graham then related how Teddy had recently put out a fire in the private projection room, which but for his steady nerve and quick wits would have destroyed a valuable firm, and perhaps the room. Then calling Teddy, who was blushing like a schoolboy, he presented him with a handsome specially designed gold watch fob, bearing the inscription, "Presented to Theodore Salamon by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, for Using the Brains God Gave Him."

For "using the brains God gave them," seven employees at the Universal Pacific Coast studios were also awarded gold medals for bravery by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company on March 6. The presentation of the awards was made by Carl Laemmle, president of the company, for services rendered the company on the night, January 12, when the film cutting and joining room took fire and $100,000 worth of film was threatened with destruction.

Those who were awarded medals for their actions on this occasion are: J. W. Beatie, night watchman; Orrin Denny, employed in the developing room; B. R. Paxton, employed in the printing department, and May Siebel, Mae Wagner, Mary P. Van Laningham and Pearl Welch, all employed at the time in the cutting and joining room. All of these medals were on fobs as illustrated herewith.

WARNERGRAMS.

H. M. Warner is away again on a business trip that will take him to Pittsburgh and Cleveland, and possibly to the newly established Detroit office before he returns to New York. A message from him, inscribed at Pittsburgh, reports the demand for Warner's Features in that locality on the increase.

Over fifty of the leading newspapers throughout the country have signed up for the "Zingo" stories as novelized from the film by Miss Helen Harrington, a brilliant newspaper woman. The judgment and faith of Warner's Features, Inc., in "Zingo" seems to be fully borne out by the hundreds of inquiries received to date from all parts of the country for open dates.

Sidney Olcott, who is producing Warner's Features in the everglades of Florida, is very proud of his new leading lady, Miss Valentine Grant, who will be seen shortly in two distinctive film features—"When Men Would Kill" and "The Brute." Miss Grant has spontaneity and personality.

CONVENTION OF WARNER HEADS IN PITTSBURGH.

Back Row, Left to Right—H. Charmas, Cleveland; A. M. Muller, Cincinnati; G. D. Briggs, Jr., Philadelphia; D. C. Kingsbury, Toronto; J. P. Anderson, Washington. Middle Row, Left to Right—S. B. Kramer, Indianapolis; H. M. Warner; P. A. Powers, president; D. J. Chatkin, Buffalo; Max Herring, Pittsburgh, L. Taylor, London. Bottom Row, Left to Right—Phil Solomon, Chicago; H. M. Goetz.

Joe Ryan, the dare-devil cowboy, who has appeared in numerous Warner's Features, produced by the Colorado Motion Picture Company, is creating quite a stir among the picture-goers as evidenced by the numerous requests received at the home office for his name and favorite photograph. Josephine West, who plays with Ryan, also comes in for a share of the fan's appreciation of dare-deviltry, and open air acting. Miss West rides like a fiend and her future as a star of the silent drama is doubly assured by her ability to play character parts calling for ballroom gowns and the like.

MAJESTIC FEATURING STRONG THEMES.

"The Tie That Binds," a two-reel Majestic drama, produced by Frederick Vroom, contains a thrilling situation which will give the average audience all the "suspense" which any reasonable person could desire. Lamar Johnston plays the part of a burglar, who is captured in a bank after an exciting fight with the watchman. After he is sent to prison his wife marries his rival and when the convict is released and seeks to see his child, the step-father, realizing the evil effect that he might have upon the little one, orders him away. The desperate man steals to the house where the little family live. Through the window he sees some one sitting in a chair. He can only see the back of the chair and a man's hat, which he recognizes as belonging to the other man. In reality his own child is in the chair, and has put on the hat to "play papa." The ex-convict raises his pistol and is about to fire when the child suddenly gets up in the chair and he realizes that he was about to take the life of the one dearest to him. The shock makes him resolve to reform his ways.

NO DULL MOMENTS IN THESE.

One of the features in "A Diamond In the Rough," a two-reel drama, produced by Director John Adolphi, is a child riding on horseback across a mountain torrent. The part is ably played by little Edna Mae Wilson, already well known in Majestic pictures. The other leading characters in the play are portrayed by Miriam Cooper, Eugene Pallette and Sam De Grasse, and as they are expert riders, the play is replete with stirring examples of daring riding. Eugene Pallette rescues his sweetheart, played by Miss Cooper, from a trying situation, which is just the kind of part his numerous admirers want him to play.

Nor is there a dull moment in "The Body in the Trunk," produced by Director John B. O'Brien, which opens with a knife throwing act in a vaudeville theater, where Billie West, the pretty little leading woman who has won the hearts of all picture audiences, smilingly stands against a velvet covered board, while William Garwood and George Larkin throw knives at her. The knife throwers, played by Garwood and Larkin, quarrel; Larkin dies suddenly and circumstances strongly indicate that his brother, played by Garwood, is responsible for his death. Garwood is found guilty and sentenced to die. His sweetheart (Billie West) goes to the capital, but the governor refuses to pardon the condemned man. The opportune arrival of the district attorney with proof of the prisoner's innocence turns the tide and the governor signs the pardon. The district attorney and the girl miss the train back to the town where the girl's sweetheart is to be executed. They take an automobile, which is delayed by the destruction of a bridge, from which the girl takes a da gerous leap from the bridge to the ground below, gets on a railway motor car and arrives at the prison just in time to save the man she loves.

JENNINGS' LIFE IN PHOTOPLAY.

The life of Al Jennings, former bandit, one of the most remarkable human documents ever written, will be reproduced in a six-reel photoplay by Thanhouser Film Corporation, for Direct-from-Broadway Features. Jennings, accompanied by Sheriff "Bill" Tillman, of Oklahoma, will reach New York this week (Saturday), for a conference with C. J. Hite, at New Rochelle. The scenario will follow closely the Saturday Evening Post story of Jennings' career as county official, train robber and convict, and will carry the Post title, "Beating Back." Readers of the Saturday Evening Post will remember the fight at "Spike S" ranch, where the Jennings' gang is decimated. This battle, for such it was, will be shown in every detail.

THANHOUSER TO PICTURE DEPTHS.

Carl Gregory, of the Thanhouser forces, sailed April 4, aboard the Ward liner Vigilancia for the Bahamas, to make an under-water scene, which will be one of the thrills in "The Million Dollar Mystery," the serial photoplay now in preparation at New Rochelle for the Syndicate Film Corporation. Harold MacGrath and Lloyd F. Lonergan are the authors of the new thriller, which will follow "Adventures of Kathlyn" in the Chicago Tribune and other newspapers throughout the country. It is expected this under-water scene will prove one of the most sensational ever put into a motion picure play. Mr. Gregory is equipped with the most improved apparatus, and by means of a well in the center of a barge will be enabled to lower himself in an especially constructed steel chamber, to a great depth.

TO DISCONTINUE "KOMIC" BRAND.

The Komic brand of Mutual Movies will be discontinued after the release of Wednesday, April 29th, which will be "Izzy and the Bandit." In place of this single-reel comedy subject, a one-reel Reliance drama will be released every Wednesday. This will give the Reliance brand three releases weekly on the Mutual program: the Mutual Girl on Mondays, a one-reel drama on Wednesdays and a two-part feature on Saturdays. Every fifth week there is an additional Reliance picture, a one-reel Friday drama. The Royal brand comedies will continue to release a reel every Saturday.

SMALLWOOD REORGANIZES.

A new film manufacturing company has filed its certificate of incorporation with the Secretary of State at Albany, N. Y., and will be known as the Smallwood Film Corporation. It is incorporated for $100,000. The new company will take over the business of the United States Film Company, of which Arthur N. Smallwood was general manager. It will specialize in the making and distribution of industrial and educational subjects, a line of endeavor in which the United States Film Company was a pioneer. A sky-light studio and a well equipped factory was under way the first of April. The company will, in addition to making industrial and educational subjects, produce features, but only upon special order from state right sellers.

Every facility will be offered so that all the state rights man need to do is to furnish his scenario and producing expenses. The company will not release features of its own make, but will rest content with making industrial and dramatic subjects to order. The original United States Film Company, with which Mr. Smallwood has been identified since its inception, was organized early in 1908 at Cincinnati, Ohio, and was a member of the old Motion Picture Alliance. Mr. Smallwood will be the treasurer and general manager of the new corporation.

Notes of the Trade.

JAMES YOUNG, the Vitagraph motion picture director, who is responsible for "Goodness Gracious," recently presented at the Vitagraph Theater, starred for several seasons in "Brown of Harvard." In his support were youngsters, with whom Mr. Young was continually working, in order to perfect them in the rudiments of acting. One is Carlyle Blackwell, the former Kalem leading man, and the other is J. Warren Kerrigan, now appearing to wonderful advantage as the star of "Samson."

Large crowds were in evidence the latter part of the first week, which was due a good deal to better weather conditions.

The steam whaler, Herman, Captain C. T. Pedersen, sailed from San Francisco on March 25th for the Arctic on a combined whaling, trading, rescue and moving picture expedition. One of the features of the expedition will be a search for the Steffansson vessel, Karluk, which, with the greater part of her crew, has been missing for months in in the icy regions of the far North. Captain Pedersen believes that somewhere between Point Barrow and Herschel Island the vessel will be found in case it has not been ground to pieces in the ice. The Steffansson expedition left Nome on July 17, 1913, going to Point Barrow, it being the intention to traverse the Northwest Passage and secure information concerning the "blonde" Esquimaux which Steffansson had discovered on a previous expedition. The season closed early and while Steffansson and three companions were hunting, weather conditions changed and the Karluk drifted away and has not been seen since. All of the exciting features of the rescue expedition will be recorded in moving pictures to be taken under the supervision of Edward H. Kemp, of San Francisco. Eugene H. Roth, of the Portola Theater, has secured the rights to these and it is anticipated that something of an unusual character will be brought back late in the Fall. W. W. Morse, who accompanied President Wilson on his Bermuda trip, went North with the Herman as moving picture operator. Pictures will be taken of whaling, hunting, and of the strange tribes in the Arctic.

CHURCH.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

THE St. Louis Motion Picture Company has just finished a thousand-foot reel of film for the Business Men's League of this city. The pictures show parks, wholesale and retail business districts, and other points of interest, and will be used to advertise the city. The film will be sent with the delegation that will tour South America in the interest of the civic bodies engaged in pushing St. Louis to the front.

The Pageant and Drama Association is advertising the great spectacle to be staged here the last of May by using slides in all the local theaters. The work is in the hands of Cave and Craig, the publicity committee of the celebration.

The Shubert Theater, an old line, high-class theater, finished out the open dates occasioned by the withdrawal of "The Lure" from its boards in response to local complaints, with "The Life of Our Savior," by Pathe. Prices ranging from ten to fifty cents were charged. It is rumored that the Shubert will run several large picture features after its regular dramatic season closes.

Horace Swope, chairman of the moving picture committee of the Pageant and Masque which is to be produced here on the last four days in May, stags that special advance rehearsals in full costume will be given for the benefit of the successful bidders for the moving picture privilege.

More than seventy-five hundred actors will take part in the pageant and masque, which will show a number of scenes, depicting the history of St. Louis from the prehistoric Mound Builders to the date of the civil war. A special scenario will be made from the play, which is by Thomas Wood Stephens, that will arrange the thousands of horsemen, settlers, Indians, Mound Builders, etc., into camera groupings and scenes that will carry the story of the spectacular performance in the films in the same manner as the staged drama.

On account of the wide publicity which is being given the celebration, and the fact that splendid four or five-reel feature, trained, costumed, and rehearsed, all ready for the camera is offered, it is expected that there will be keen competition for the filming privilege, but Mr. Swope says that The Pageant Drama Association will award the concession to a company capable of handling the subject in an artistic and dignified manner.

The Garrick Theater, formerly a straight dramatic house, is now converted to pictures, and is running "The Rise and Fall of Napoleon." The Garrick seats 1,200 and seems to have no trouble in keeping the place comfortably filled at twenty-five cents a seat, with a straight bill of films.

Harry Yaeger has left the Universal Exchange and is now with the Garrick.

About a year ago some friend of the Misses in charge of Mount St. Rose Hospital, devoted to the care of patients suffering from tuberculosis, took a moving picture machine and a program of films to the hospital to give the inmates an evening's entertainment. So great was the good that resulted from the performance that arrangements were made to repeat it, and moving pictures are now a regular weekly event at the hospital.

The Park Theater, at Delmar Boulevard and Hamilton avenue, has reduced prices to ten and twenty cents.

BILLY BISON.

MISSOURI.

THE arrival of Spring has proved a favorable development for Kansas City exhibitors. The streets have been thronged with shoppers almost daily, and the majority have taken advantage of the occasion by dropping in at animated picture houses to beguile away an hour or so of the afternoon. This has been especially marked in the case of women, of course. Masculine devotion to the silent drama, however, has in no wise shown a decrease of any nature and the situation is in eminently satisfactory shape.

The J. W. Morgan Film Company, of Kansas City, has been taken over by S. F. Ward, who has been with the company since its formation about five years ago. The new owner will continue to handle supplies of all kinds in addition to feature films. Mr. Morgan, it is understood, will enter the producing end of the business, though his exact plans have not been announced.

A moving picture machine and several reels of films have been stolen in Kansas City recently. Joseph Wirthman, a local operator, lost the machine, which was stored at 602 East Thirty-first street. Four reels of film were stolen from an automobile standing in front of the Twelfth-street Theater. The two robberies are connected by local exhibitors, though without any actual evidence, that the same men committed both.

An instance of fast work in moving picture circles was given recently when the Empress Theater, of Kansas City, showed pictures of the disastrous Missouri Athletic Club fire of St. Louis while the ruins were still warm. The St. Louis Motion Picture Company secured the views, which were shipped to Kansas City and shown immediately at the moving picture-vaudeville theater.

Dr. J. A. Horrigan has secured a permit to remodel the Mystic Theater, at Thirty-first and Main streets, and will rush the work through at a cost of about $1,000.

The movement for local censorship is still being waged at Topeka, Kan., though no actual results toward that end have been secured by the reformers. "Bleeding Kansas" still has a lot of troubles, and exhibitors of Topeka are among those who have a good deal of foolishness to combat.

Houses in the business section of Kansas City have done an exceptionally good business recently by reason of the political campaign being waged.

A good many theaters in the residential districts have been converted into temporary political quarters and are being used for campaign oratory and meetings. Most of the exhibitors were loath to turn over their houses summarily, but finally decided in many cases to allow them to be utilized for the purpose indicated. The result was that patrons of animated pictures in many residential sections of the city were forced to make a trip into the business district for their recreation.

The bill introduced in the Kansas City council prohibiting the erection of airdomes by temporary exhibitors, and the display of moving pictures in tents will come up in the near future. The measure was pigeon-holed during the pre-election campaign, but is scheduled to come up for action some time in April. The measure, as it stands, also calls for lower license fees. On this point, however, there is a strong division of opinion, many exhibitors wishing to "stand pat" on the present amount or even seek an increase. It is pointed out by the smaller exhibitors, however, that the section eliminating airdome amusement men in itself obviates the need for any increase in licenses for protection.

Kansas City now has a Photoplaywright club. Edward Lambert having been elected president at the organization meeting recently held. Walter E. Odell is secretary. The usual number of local residents have attempted writing the silent drama and enough have sold their efforts to make an organization worth while.

May 1 is the tentative date set for the opening of Frank L. Newman's new theater at 1022 Main street. The house will be known as the Royal. Mr. Newman heads the Royal Theater Company, other officers being T. H. Outlaw, vice-president and treasurer, and W. P. Fulkerson, secretary. Plans for the new home of the silent drama are pretentious in the extreme and much interest is being manifested, both by exhibitors and the public. A ten-piece orchestra is to be used, but will be supplemented by a massive pipe organ. One of the unusual features will be a children's play room, where the kiddies may be left in care of a competent maid, while the grown-ups see the pictures. Ladies will have a rest room. Finally, there will be a check-room for babies, which should prove the crowning feature of the Royal's bid for popularity.

J. J. Brown, Kansas City representative of Pathe's Weekly, was called to Lincoln, Neb., recently by the sudden death of his father-in-law.

The Electric Theater, at Twelfth street and Grand avenue, which has changed hands a half dozen times in the past year, has met its destiny in the shape of a razing crew. The old building is being wrecked to make way for a modern structure. The Electric was never regarded with much favor by exhibitors, who have watched its razing without tears.

Rapid progress has been made on the remodeling of the Alamo Theater, at Thirty-fourth and Main streets, which is operated by the Standard Amusement Company and managed by Joseph Spero. Several thousand dollars have been spent in improvements. Mr. Spero, who is a veteran of the business, as veterans go, considering the comparative youth of the animated picture profession, is specializing on features, where high-grade multiple-reel films are available. With the features, however, he usually presents a light comedy, for the sake of variety and also in order to send his audience home with smiles, if possible.

Another feature is the publication of a weekly program, compact enough to fit in a lady's purse or a man's vest pocket. The program covers the week ahead, usually containing six pages of synopses made as interesting as possible.

Joseph H. Gilday, who for the past six years has managed the Broadmoor among other Kansas City motion picture theaters, has been placed in charge of the Twelfth-street Theater, operated by the Standard Amusement Company. Mr. Gilday succeeds Billy Smith at the Standard house. Mr. Smith probably will take charge of the Tenth-street Theater, another unit in the Standard chain. Winthrop Allen, secretary of the company, who has been devoting much of his time to the management of the Tenth-street Theater, expects to give all of his time to executive work in the future.

The Kansas City office, through which the George Kleine attractions were distributed in the Southwest, has been closed, H. W. Glickauf returning to Chicago. Mr. Glickauf opened the Kansas City branch only a few months ago. For the present, Kansas City will be served from the Chicago offices of the company. However, it is intimated that the withdrawal is temporary.

Motion picture men of Kansas City were deeply interested in a large theatrical deal staged there recently with Marcus Loew in the principal role. Mr. Loew took over the theaters, leases and other connections of Sullivan & Considine. The details were settled after several days of negotiations. Of the twenty-eight theaters involved, the Empress is the only Kansas City house. The Empress, with most of the other theaters which changed hands, uses multiple-reel features frequently in conjunction with vaudeville, and it is believed this policy will be continued.

The Standard Amusement Company has established a plan which promises more than most of those which embrace the censorship idea. The company has fitted up a private exhibition room in the basement of the Palace Theater, in Main street, and runs a number of films in the morning for the benefit of its staff. Managers of its four houses, with the officers of the company, form the audience to decide whether the pictures will appeal to the patrons of the respective theaters. The censorship in this instance is exercised not to eliminate risque pictures, but merely to select those which will prove popular in the theaters in which they are to be shown. As far as immoral pictures are concerned, President H. B. Lappe believes that "there ain't no such animal," or that if there is, it is so nearly extinct that there is little danger of encountering it on the beaten paths, or in other words, through legitimate exchanges.

J. Erwin Dodson, for the past two years with the Universal Exchange at Fort Smith, Ark., has taken over the management of the World Film Corporation's Kansas City branch, vice J. W. Sutter. The latter has been in charge since the first of the year. He intends to remain in the motion picture business, though his exact plans have not been disclosed. Mr. Dodson has been succeeded as manager of the Fort Smith office of the Universal by J. H. Crowley. The changes were effective April 1.

J. E. Stratford, of the Border News Service, was an added attraction at the Twelfth-street Theater recently. Mr. Stratford spent about six years in Mexico and is therefore intimate with the situation in that country. He presented a number of slides of Mexican celebrities. While disclaiming any intention of going into the merits or demerits of the present trouble in Mexico, the speaker asserted that he is in whole-souled sympathy with the aggressors in the revolution. Because of the situation in Mexico, Mr. Stratford proved a popular addition to the program at the motion picture theater, though the Standard plan is to present straight pictures as a rule.

A new series of motion pictures is to be taken at Fort Riley, Kan., in the immediate future, and will be shown in all parts of the country. The idea is to give the public intimate views of the soldiers at work and at play, that it may know just what sort of creatures comprise the standing army. At present, soldiers in uniform are often barred from amusement resorts, merely because they are attired in army clothes. It is hoped that a keener respect for military garb will be created by the moving pictures, and the government has therefore decided to adopt the new plan on a pretentious scale.

An arrangement, which has been welcomed gratefully by the musicians, has been put into effect at the Twelfth-street Theater. In most cases, the piano player, orchestra, or whoever provides the music for the pictures, is placed just about where the orchestra is in ordinary theaters. The Standard recently reached the conclusion that there was no particular need of the musicians straining their necks, and accordingly placed them on a balcony to the left of the screen. From this point of vantage the pictures may be seen from a natural attitude and appropriate music rendered without difficulty. The plan will be used in all of the Standard theaters in the future.

The Novelty Theater, of Topeka, Kan., has taken advantage of the vanity or curiosity of residents of that city by featuring moving pictures of a dozen or so local celebrities daily. The Novelty cameraman makes the pictures and runs them off at each performance as a part of the regular program. The plan has been successful in stimulating attendance, and has been handled at slight expense. Most of the principals in the pictures are so pleased at seeing themselves on the screen that they purchase the film, according to the management of the Novelty.

A shadow clock, now used rather generally in Western theaters, has been installed in the Iris Theater, at Topeka, Kan.

The Willis Wood, one of the old burlesque theaters of Kansas City, will show motion pictures as soon as the theatrical season is at an end. The house, under its present management, will specialize on multiple-reel features, and will do most of its buying from the Kansas City Feature Film Company. The initial offering will be "The Sea Wolf," a seven-part feature. Prices at the Willis Wood will be from 10 to 25 cents. The features will be run for an entire week, no longer, in case of good enough patronage. The hours will be from 1 to 5 o'clock in the afternoon and from 7 to 11 at night.

A house organ is now being distributed by the Kansas City Feature Film Company. The bulletin contains eight pages and is printed weekly.

William Johns is the new owner of the Aurora and Grand Theaters, at Lawrence, Kan., where the college boys get away from routine by taking in the silent drama. N. H. Gibbons, the former owner, probably will re-enter the business elsewhere.

S. C. Thompson, formerly owner of the Orpheum Theater, at Mexico, Mo., has sold out there and purchased a house at Marshall, Mo.

The mayor of Topeka, Kan., apparently is a wise man. One or two women's organizations in the Kansas capital demanded a local board of censors. "Sure," responded the mayor. "I am quite willing to appoint such a board. I will select a butcher, a baker and an electric light maker. All you have to do is to put up a guaranty fund of $5,000 for their annual salaries." Whereupon the local censor boom was pricked with a pin and collapsed into oblivion.

MURRAY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE smallpox scare in the South is working havoc with the moving picture business. Some of the houses have already remained closed for two months and the date of reopening has not yet been set. From a Virginian town comes the wail of a lonesome operator who is quarantined and can neither keep his theater going nor leave that little burg and its five thousand inhabitants. In at least one place the postoffice has been closed for several weeks.

According to a special dispatch from London, England, 22 out of 7,488 films submitted to the British board of film censors were entirely rejected during the last year. Exception was taken to 166 films on various grounds, but many of these were finally passed after certain eliminations were made, varying from five to six hundreds of feet. The grounds on which films were rejected included indelicate suggestive situations, indecent dancing, the holding up of a minister of religion to ridicule, cruelty to animals, indelicate accessories in the staging, judicial executions, excessive drunkenness and native customs in foreign lands abhorrent to British ideas. Since the inception of the board 7,628,821 feet of film has been examined.

The Empire Amusement Company, formed to conduct moving picture shows at 911-13-15 H street, Northeast, and on C street, between Fifth and Sixth streets, Northeast, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $6,500, divided into 650 shares of the par value of $10 each. The officers are Samuel Greenberg, president, and Louis W. Atkinson, secretary. They, with Laura P. Atkinson and Dora Greenberg, will act as trustees for the first year.

The management of the Alhambra Theater is presenting the holder of a lucky number each week day a set of dishes in the "Alhambra China Store." Each person upon entering the theater is handed a ticket bearing a space for their name and address, below which are the following instructions: "Fill out and drop in box at door. Respond promptly if winner of china set." At nine o'clock, just prior to the closing of the evening's entertainment, a child is singled out from among the audience and requested to pick out one of the cards, and the person whose name appears thereon is declared winner of the set. If the winner be in the theater at the time, presentation is immediately made; if not, a notification to call for the set of dishes is sent. The dishes, while neat and making a good gift, are comparatively inexpensive and well adapted to this purpose.

The Belmont Amusement Company will soon open its new theater at 2114 Fourteenth street, North west. The house will be attractively decorated and is designed to seat 300. The investment is placed at $10,000 and the incorporators of the company, which just received its charter, are W. F. Zanner, A. P. Reyburn and C. B. Bauman, Jr.

The proposal to erect moving picture theaters on King street and on Columbus street, in Alexandria, Va., was the subject of protest by adjoining property owners who petitioned the council of that city to first investigate before granting permission for the same. At a meeting of the council the matter was referred to the general laws committee of that body.

Conditions in moving picture theaters of East St Louis have been sharply criticized by the East St Louis Commercial Club. The Ways and Means Committee of that organization asked the City Council and Board of Fire Commissioners to make an investigation. It is said that members of the committee found photoplay patrons standing in the aisles in violation of the state and city laws.

Miss Bess Bean, chairman of the amusements committee of the Woman's Club of Galesburg who in 1911 made a report upon the amusement conditions in that city has again made a report which shows that a change for the better has been wrought. Miss Bean in a good story telling and up to date report insisted on a high standard for the moving picture scene were logical and child like characters present her ideas in anecdotal illustration. She built up a bad case against a "perfect" picture which sent a boy to the court, but just as emphatic did the boy who had seen a moving picture of animal life in drinking water, stop his mother from giving his little sick brother an drink of suspicious water which had not been boiled. "No, I seen on at the picture show, and they are big like roosters and birds and they hop and jump and eat lizzes insides," he said. In showing the improvement made in the moving picture, Miss Bean was pleased that they had dispensed with the singing and illustrating of the popular and often cheap song. "Today the nickel shows are in fairly good condition as to light, seating capacity and cleanliness. As to the pictures shown there is a decided uplift noticeable, but there is much room for still further improvements in this feature at all the shows."

A homecoming by moving pictures was the unusual stunt recently conducted in Canton and Lewistown. Former residents of the two towns, who are now in California, were banded together in a county Society of Southern California. The Canton, Ill., Register had the annual picnic at Los Angeles, Cal., filmed and the reels were shipped back home to give former friends and neighbors a glimpse of the exiles. The pictures attracted much attention at the Princess in Canton and the Princess in Lewistown, as they were well advertised by the paper which originated the scheme.

The manufacturers, jobbers and wholesalers of Peoria are to make a tour of some of the Middle Western States. Their special trains will carry several reels of pictures, and at Omaha, Council Bluffs and Ottumwa, where long stops will be made, the moving pictures will show the natives that Peoria can back up her claims.

Exhibitors of Quincy have been requested by the new board of censorship to give films the "once over" before they are shown. The board thinks a manager ought to know what's in his program before the crowd comes in. The manner in which the board will work has not been definitely decided. A stand against indecent pictures, with the board backing up any member who thinks a picture is indecent, was agreed upon. The perilous question of what tragedies were to be permitted has not been up for action. Proprietors will be required to ventilate their theaters after each performance and to fumigate once a day during smallpox scares. It has been suggested that the public be allowed to attend the regular meetings of the board.

Fred Mecklenburg, of Los Angeles, Cal., but for merly of Bowmanville, Ill., has sent a picture of his new theater in Los Angeles to friends and it will be hung in the art room of the public library.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

THE moving picture theaters in Springfield will be studied from the standpoint of an expert in amusements. A social survey is now going in the city under the direction of the Russell Sage Foundation. It is backed by the most prominent people of Springfield and if the local photoplay houses emerge from the inspection with a clean bill of health it should have a tendency to promote the better class of patronage. Lee F. Hanner, director of the department of recreation, is in Springfield and the scrutiny of the picture houses will be made under his direction. He is a member of the National Board of Censorship.

Indeed F. Schnepp, Mayor John S. Schnepp, of this city, and James R. McCormick, of Emden, have taken a lease on Powers Theater, the leading house in Decatur. Like all the larger "legitimate Houses" it will book some pictures. Young Schnepp has been treasurer of the Chatterton Theater, in Bloomington.

Fire Chief Bolte, of Springfield, is heartily in accord with the plan of the state fire marshal to have all moving picture theaters flash slides urging patrons to pick out the nearest exit and use it in case of fire. This plan was suggested by the state fire marshal in a recent bulletin. Recommendation was made by the Springfield fire chief that it be adopted in this city, but only one theater complied, and the matter has again been taken up.

The case against the striking motion picture operators of Springfield charged with conspiracy in interfering with the patrons of Springfield photoplay houses was continued for the second time until April 8.

The Airdome on South Fourth Street, between Adams and Monroe streets, will again be operated and will open for business as soon as the weather permits.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

THE Federated Women's Clubs of Lawrence, Kan., propose to find out if censorship of the moving picture theaters is needed. The matter was brought up at a meeting of the Civic Study Club, which decided to cooperate with the other organizations in the city, and after an unofficial survey of the situation make a report to the Federation Convention with the evidence to be suggested. At the same meeting a paper was read by Miss Cassie Quinlan, in which she expressed an opinion that supervision of the photoplay houses would be one of the duties of a police woman.

The Star Academy at McAlester, Okla., has been leased by Bart Estes.

Moving pictures were a feature of the St. Patrick's Day celebration of the Commercial Club, at Courtland, Tex.

A two-reel film, "The Water Builders," was shown at the Grand Theater, in Kansas City, Mo., when the retail jewelers of Missouri were at their annual convention

'OUR MUTUAL GIRL' AN IRISH LASSIE!

If you have ever been led to believe that 13 is an unlucky number and if you want to prove once and for all that 13 is really the luckiest number of them all, you simply must see the 13th reel of

"Our MUTUAL Girl"

This is the installment of this great motion picture series in which Margaret is so infected with the spirit of St. Patrick's Day that she swears allegiance to old Erin, goes to watch the Parade on Fifth Avenue, cheers the green flag enthusiastically and has as good a time as if she really came from the "ould sod." Margaret also finds time to visit "Louise," the fashionable milliner, and is delighted with the new Spring styles, which make

SONNY JIM AT THE NORTH POLE (April 20).—Daddy Jim loses his collar button, which is found later by Sonny, sticking in the end of the collar father had angrily ripped off. The oat-meal tastes burnt to Daddy and he pushes it away from him. Sonny feeds his to Shep, the dog, and gets a severe scolding. All of which gets Daddy into such a temper, that when Sonny again feeds the dog and smashes a dish, his father tells him if it happens again he will have to give Shep away. Sonny decides that Daddy Jim doesn't love him and Shep any more and that they will run away and find the North Pole mentioned in the newspaper that morning, about which Daddy had told him. Bundling up well, taking his sled, a small flag, hammer and nails, Sonny sallies forth with his dog, Shep, wading through the deep snow. He asks his way of several people he meets, but they all laugh. He comes to a railroad crossing, just below which ties have been thrown across the track by some track laborers, who plan to wreck the express in revenge for being disebarsed by their foreman. Sonny is very tired now and begins to cry. Suddenly he sees a pole with a sign on it reading, "North-old, Five Miles." Thinking he has found the North Pole, he tacks the flag on it so that it flutters toward the track. Sonny is missed and his mother calls up his father, who is in an adjoining town. He barely catches the express, which is soon speeding on toward the barrier of destruction. The engineer sees the flag and stops the train. The train crew go forward to investigate and find the ties on the track and Sonny fast asleep in the snow. Some of the passengers have come up, among them Daddy Jim, who says, "Thank God," and Sonny sleepily says, "I found the North Pole, Daddy." He is brought to his anxious mother and all feel very proud of him. Nothing is too good for him and Shep.

THE SPIRIT AND THE CLAY (Special—2 parts—April 21).—After finishing his day's work in the field, Paul, a young farmer, who lives with his aged father and mother, goes with Marie, his orphan cousin, to an old shed which they have fitted up as a workshop and there sets to work at his clay-modeling. While he is working, Galton, an artist, appears and realizing that Paul is a born sculptor, tells him to come to New York with him to his study. Marie, Galton and Paul tell the aged parents of the plan. They finally consent. Paul proves a worthy pupil and makes marvelous progress. Paul's father writes him to come home, as he is needed on the farm. Marie hears of it and she agrees to do Paul's work and her own too. She finally breaks down, but feels that it is well worth while for Paul's sake. Paul returns home successful, learns what Marie has done for him and marries her. They return to his studio in New York, but she quickly declines. Her physician orders her to leave the city and find more suitable climate. She is about to return to her home when she learns Paul cannot find a desirable model for his Statue of Fame, which he expects to place in competition. Marie consents to pose, and although the doctor advises her strongly against it, she will not listen. When the model is nearly completed, the strain proves too much for her and she falls dead.

Paul's mind is affected by his great sorrow, and he sees a beautiful vision of his dead wife. Inspired by it, he works feverishly on his unfinished model. His friends watch his untiring industry, knowing his mind is safe in the occupation. When the statue is finished, his delirium returns and he believes the image to be his wife in the clay and tries to warm it into life by his mad kisses and embraces. His friends decide to make a last effort to save his sanity by stealing the statue and hiding it. After the doctor has given Paul an opiate, they cautiously approach the statue. Paul awakens, fights them off and backing toward the open window, crashes through it, carrying the statue with him. Lying amid the scattered fragments he sees again the vision of his wife beckoning to him. As the moonbeams play upon his upturned face, he dies with a smile on his lips.

FANNY'S MELODRAMA (April 22).—Although deeply in love with his wife, Smith is intensely jealous of her and when she receives a note from her cousin, Tom, to the effect that they have decided to give the melodrama, "The Wicked Earle," as a surprise to Mr. Smith on his birthday. He sees her reading the note, and is extremely curious. He also overhears her make an appointment to meet somebody at 2 o'clock that afternoon. Smith then becomes jealous and suspicious and determines to be on the job. That afternoon, the conspirators arrive and proceed to rehearse their little amateur theatrical. Smith, in his office, thinks all morning about that little appointment and arrives at his home just in time to witness the first act wherein the heroine surrenders her young guileless heart to the hero, etc., and seeing his wife in another man's arms, is transformed into a raving madman. He rushes in, denounces his wife and rushes out again, saying he is going to his lawyer's about a divorce. The performers decide to go on with the play and surprise him anyway, whether he likes it or not. It is a thrilling play and the plot gets deeper and deeper; finally, Fanny, Smith's wife, who is the heroine, decides to steal some papers from the safe. She is seen by Marie, the maid, who dashes off to consult her fiance, a detective. Miss Jenkins arrives and admitted by Mary Jane, the cook, they hear Mrs. Smith declaiming her lines, expressing remorse at having committed the robbery. They cautiously peep through the portiers and both agree that Mrs. Smith has gone mad. Miss Jenkins sympathetically goes for a doctor, while Mary Jane goes for the police. There is a grand finale when the police and the doctor bolt in, followed by Mary, Marie and Mrs. Jenkins. Everyone is astounded and confused. All is explained by Fanny. Smith tenderly takes his wife in his arms and "Fanny's Melodrama" is voted a howling success.

A LITTLE MADONNA (April 23).—Terrorized by Guido, her drunken and brutal father, Marie receives assurance from her dying mother that the Madonna will always protect her. The father reels in just after the mother has expired, too drunk to realize the woman is dead, and finding the whiskey bottle empty, abuses the child. Marie appeals to the image of the Madonna and Guido, in a frenzy of rage, smashes it on the floor. Horrified at the sacrilege, Marie screams, bringing in the neighbors, among them Paul Langrois, a young artist and curio-lover. Paul's sympathy is aroused and he adopts the child. Later, Marie's father, who is ignorant of her whereabouts, sees Marie purchase an expensive silver image of the Madonna. He determines to steal the statue and follows Paul home, planning to return that night and get it.

The little statue is put in a prominent place by the worshipful Marie. Paul conceives the idea of painting a picture of the Madonna. He sends for a professional model and she is just donning her costume when Paul is called away on urgent business. He tells her to wait, as he will be back shortly. He is delayed until dark, however, and the model falls asleep in the dressing room. While Marie is performing her usual devotions before the Madonna, Guido pries open the window and stealthily enters. Marie hears him and as he is about to take the silver Madonna, she grabs his arm with a scream. The door is flung wide and the model, awakened by the scream, stands in her Madonna robes, in a blaze of light. Filled with superstitious terror, the awe-struck man rushes from the place. Marie at first thinks it is the Madonna herself and kneels reverently. The model lifts her up and explains who she is, sympathetically assuring the child she need not feel. Marie feels sure that her mother's words have come true and gratefully offers up a little prayer for her safe deliverance.

TANGLED TANGOISTS (April 24).—Flora Finch and John Bunny attend a reception where the faddish tango prevails, and they are numbered among the wall flowers. Their discomforture causes a determination on the part of both to take lessons and learn. Flora, through a newspaper advertisement, takes up the tango at a nearby school, and John, through a friend, at the club, does likewise. Unknown to each other, they both choose the same school and continue in ignorance of each other's presence until the last lesson of the course. Then she sees him and he sees her. They both get invitations to attend a reception at the same time and place where they had been obliged to look on while others danced, and they agree to show the guests a thing or two in the way of real tangoing. They make a big hit at the reception by their excellent dancing. On their way home, Herbert proposes marriage to Clara and suggests that they have a Tango Novelty Wedding. She blushingly accepts him and they are married a la tango. The Justice who marries them, Clara, Herbert, the clerk, and four witnesses all keep time to the tango tune, all through the ceremony. Even the chairs, tables, pictures, and other furniture, rock back and forth, to the irresistible spirit of the dance. Some time later, Clara is seen rocking the cradle in which a fine pair of twins with fine healthy voices are crying. Herbert tells her that rocking the cradle does no good. They accordingly take the twins, one in each arm, and she and Herbert do the tango. The babies show their appreciation by ceasing their crying and falling peacefully into Slumberland.

HER BIG SCOOP (Special—2 parts—April 25).—Sent to write up Mrs. Montague Bulger's ball, Fanny Stone, a society reporter on the Eagle, is treated very shabbily. Fanny meets Bert Bailey, who has just started a new paper, called "The Era." She tells him of the treatment she has received and they plan revenge. They catch Mrs. Bulger in the conservatory spooning with a long-haired poet and they take a snapshot of them, which interesting picture Fanny publishes in the Eagle, with her account of the ball. Mrs. Bulger is furious at the sensation caused and demands Fanny's dismissal. Fanny is discharged, and while lying on her bed that night, crying, she overhears two men who occupy the room next to her, planning a bank robbery. She "shaddows" them and assured a big "scoop," offers to sell it to several of the big newspapers, but they are skeptical and finally she takes it to Bert. He is delighted when Fanny puts her proposition to him and agrees to take her "scoop." He offers her a share of the profits and a position on the paper, provided the "scoop" turns out well.

Hidden in Fanny's room, Bert and Fanny overhear more of the robber's plans and finds out that the caretaker of the bank has been bribed to help them. Bert then goes to his friend, Detective Kelly, and puts the story before him. They tell Mr. Jamieson, the manager of the bank, and on the night when the robbery is to take place, Kelly, Bert and Fanny are all put in the strong-room—so as to be in at the death, as Bert puts it. The robbers are admitted by the caretaker and are captured after a struggle in which Fanny saves Bert's life. Next morning, the New Era is out with extras telling of the capture of the robbers, the circulation trebles in a single day. The editors of the Guardian and the Eagle, the two large newspapers, find out too late what a mistake they made. Jamieson is so delighted with what Fanny and Bert have done, he advances capital to publish the New Era on a larger scale. As for Fanny and Bert, they decide to become partners in the newspaper and partners for life as well.

BIOGRAPH.

THE BONDAGE OF FEAR (April 13).—"Whatever the trouble, you're going to marry me," declared the determined young lover. In her efforts to save her helpless father, she came again under her brother's power. He would have ruined her husband's name as well, but for the unexpected from the aged father.

MELODY AND ART (April 16).—Fried eggs, music, crackers and art told the story of the girl above and the youth below. Her art and his music nothing more, each one thought. A rose started something as it always does. Her art aspirations were found to be vain, but her willing hands took the place of those that would never play again.

AMBITIOUS PA (April 18).—Pa was set and set good on the idea of daughter's marrying a theatrical manager. All would have been well but for the sudden visit of the actress lady. "Why Percy, my own little chorus boy," she cried. Later, Percy bereft of his trousers queered himself again.

MIXED MAILS (April 18).—Bad business, no spring clothes for the wives, so last season's must do. That was what started it. Then peeved husbands telephoned and wrote brokers. Letters and wires got mixed. Divorces and scandalized wives appeared in the mix-up. But everybody was glad it happened just the same—there was a fortune in store.

ESSANAY.

THE SPIRIT OF THE MADONNA (April 21).—Fred Martin, a poor workman, meets with an accident which costs him his arm. Mrs. Martin calls on James Thompson, the owner of the factory, to seek aid, which he refuses. Thompson purchases a beautiful oil painting of the Madonna. His conscience bothers him, and as he sat in his library that evening smoking, he imagined that the Madonna stepped from the picture and pleaded with him to help his employee, who had been so faithful. His conscience got the better of him—and he did help.

WRONG ALL AROUND (April 22).—Howard Simpkins suspects his wife and is therefore jealous. On returning from a business trip he is ousted roughly by a big man, who tells him "he is the boss." As a matter of fact, an English dude had followed Mrs. Simpkins to her home and the plumber is called upon to protect her until her husband arrived. Many complications arise, which will bring shrieks of laughter from the onlookers.

SLIPPERY SLIM AND THE STORK (April 23).—Slippery Slim is in love with Sophie Clutts and the wedding day has been set. Mustang Pete is also in love with Sophie, so when the stagecoach arrived at Snakeville that day with an adandoned baby, he plans revenge. Mustang, with the rest of the cow-punchers, take the baby to Slim's home. They also send a note to Sophie, purporting to be from Slim, telling her to come and see what Heaven had sent him. Sophie arrives at Slim's home, where she accuses him of deceiving her. When the real mother arrives there is much confusion—and Slim is blamed for it all.

BRONCHO BILLY—GUNMAN (April 25).—Jack Holmes, a squatter, and his daughter, Margaret, settle on land owned by Harry Rawlins. Broncho Billy, gunman, is engaged by Rawlins to eject the squatter or put him out of the way. Broncho is wounded by a half-breed and Margaret nurses him back to health. The gunman then refuses to turn Holmes out. Emery, Rawlin's son, falls in love with Margaret, and she promises to become his wife. Broncho Billy smiles as he turns on his heel to leave for other parts.

Program Lines.

THROUGH the courtesy of W. H. Swanson (yes, that's Bill Swanson dressed up), we have come up with this clipping from the St[illegible] Lines. Read:

We are not sure that we have found another reason for the universal popularity of the moving picture show, but we believe we may have done so.

[illegible] supplied by one of the local theaters this week contained [illegible] to the effect that "Blanks Cigarettes Are Used Exclusively at This Performance."

[illegible] addition of the Arcadeum Cafe has been almost [illegible] during many ways. It is not [illegible] long ago that theater programs were confined to the announcements of the title of the play and the names of the players, and handbills were then in vogue.

Bit by little by little the theater program has grown. It has become a sort of booklet dealing with theatrical matters generally. Sometimes there are collections of anecdotes. There are skilled advertisements. And as an elaboration of the news touching the production on view we have learned to expect to be told that the costumes in use were designed by So-and-So, and that the shoes were supplied by somebody else, and that the wigs were [illegible] this or that studio.

We took kindly to these somewhat inconsequential matters, though we never regarded the wig and the costume as [illegible] equal mention with the names of great players and [illegible] rights.

But we are really aghast at the idea of giving the cigarette its place with the shoes and the costumes and the painted castles. We are scarcely reconciled to the cigaret itself on the stage though it has been [illegible] since poor Della Fox, singing in "Wang," [illegible] a cigarette and blew a cloud of smoke from her nostrils [illegible] that memorable, naughty song "A Summer Night." We cannot help pausing in the presence of the honored cigarette. Still we, in future performances of "Ten Nights in a Barroom," insist that "Blank's whisky is used exclusively in this performance," for in the next presentation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" that "Blank's" kennels supplied the hounds engaged in this production," or in the next rustic drama that the third act laid in a country store that Blank's hams and bacons are used exclusively in this act."

We like to progress. We even like to move rapidly. But some of the developments in the legitimate theater [illegible] are being [illegible]

This would be no particular hearing on the motion picture business were it not that there is a growing tendency to similarize those of play programs. [illegible] place of wigs and shoes and tights [illegible] the news that the house is perfumed with "Skidoorium," that the vacuum cleaner is from Jones & Smith and similar [illegible] statistics.

In some few places advertisements are being run into the program space proper and we see that on Thursday the feature will be "The Little Lame Child," with a foot-note to the effect that she would not have been lost had her mother smoked Tightrope Stogies or had mother fed her Baby Beef Cubes.

Outside advertising is all right in a program [illegible] off by itself, but do not forget to first make the program work for [illegible] and then for the other fellow. The habit is [illegible] Break yourself of it before it is too late.

Just Starting.

The Majestic Theater, Bloomfield, [illegible] sends in the first issue of a weekly, a [illegible] four pager, and we don't know how to build up. On the [illegible] they want to make the program work for them. They do not [illegible] very large page, the type page being only four by six inches. Most of the [illegible] pages are given to a ten point reprint of Elbert Hubbard [illegible] Little Journeys, which is interesting but which might [illegible] be replaced by [illegible] talk. The house has [illegible] changed over to the Mutual program. It announces that fact and gives the program for one night [illegible] the page, which also has to carry the [illegible] heading. It gives a list of the brands and a few names of players. [illegible] is a lot more than that [illegible] be said about the Mutual and this would have been more interesting [illegible] people who are unfamiliar with the Mutual brands than the [illegible] chat. They are paying [illegible] a number of money, for example, to [illegible] Griffith, who made the [illegible] pictures. The fact that he [illegible] some of the pictures to be shown at the house is [illegible] interesting than Mr. Hubbard's opinion of the pictures. There might [illegible] something said about the various studios of the companies [illegible] under the Mutual clock, something more than the players' names might be given, more than a single day's program should have been run.

If they did not want to write their own copy Phil Mindil, the Mutual publicity man, is turning out real newspaper stuff by the column all cut up into neat paragraphs that will make a nice fit. There are cuts to be had, as well, gossip of coming films. Here, at the very day of the change, the most important day of all, about the best the house has to say for the Mutual is that it has spent thousands of dollars advertising the films. It would have been better to have said that they were spending other thousands in making the films. It is announced that later on the full program will be given, which will help some.

It would be well, first of all, to set the matter two columns to the page. If the lines are too long to be read with ease. Set out the first page for [illegible] chat, comments, improvements that increase the comfort of the patrons, notes [illegible] projection, the orchestra, the house staff or anything [illegible] that sort.

The second page could be given to gossip of the players and coming [illegible] with [illegible] the brief synopses of the more important titles and company [illegible] matter.

The third page should be given to the full program for the week neatly [illegible] with uniform type. The back page can continue the reading [illegible] announce the coming [illegible] reel features. These are used. There probably would be room for four one-inch advertisements of local [illegible] men, two at the top and two at the bottom of the house matter. If house matter is advertising it should be framed in with three point [illegible]

If it is reading matter it will care for itself.

With a type page the size care should be taken not to use too large a type face for any [illegible] not larger than a twelve-point, and the face used to head items should be the same size as the body type [illegible] full face. Then it will be something that people will ask for. Anything is a start and we have seen much worse starters, but think that this [illegible] will show improvement quickly.

No!

An exhibitor writes that he sells a number of copies of this Moving Picture Story Magazine. On the [illegible] of players he rubber stamps the statement that the player is to be seen only at his houses. On the Licensed stories he similarly [illegible] that the story can be seen at his theater. He wants to know [illegible] we think of the scheme. We think it takes a pretty cold nerve to [illegible] the copy all up and then sell it for [illegible] cents. If he gave the copies away he would be doing some regular advertising, but he sells them and the purchaser is entitled to a clean copy. Even if the audience seems to stand for the imposition, we believe that the ultimate effect is bad and suggesting his contempt for the rights of his patrons. Possibly this is not what he thought he would think, but this is what we do think. A neat announcement on every page to the effect that all licensed players and stories shown could be seen at his house is one thing. A rubber stamp used on fifteen or twenty pages is something else. Many persons want to take the portraits out of the magazine to hang up and they don't want pink stamps all over them, and no one likes a mussed copy. It would be better to change over to the printed slip. Even of those who do not will voice their objections, but they will object more or the less.

Used Lions.

The Jefferson Theater, St. Augustine, has real lions to advertise "Quo Vadis." The answer is that there is a small circus wintering there, the animals being rented to a film company in the making of plays. Few managers are able to borrow a couple of lions for a day or so, but this seems to be a good chance to try it. S. A. Arnold's dodge [illegible] will be remembered that Mr. Arnold built a fake cage and put a boy [illegible] with a toy can in the head of which was a bit of catgut. Pulling a [illegible] cloth down the gut gave a noise that a trap drummer calls a "lion roar." Get a couple of the big sheets that show the lions entering the arena, get the small boy with his mouse-producer inside and start out.

Anything new will win attention once. Anything that makes a noise is better than something that doesn't, but don't use the same thing too often or it will go stale.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Notice

WILL those readers of this department who have original script criticism or who contemplate obtaining such, please refer to the advertisement on another page that this offer has been withdrawn.

At no time has it been strictly profitable to criticize scripts for two dollars a reel, but such criticism has been of use as a study of the trials that confront the beginner and which this writer, in his own practise, has forgotten. It seems that the close study of the efforts of a few writers, through a systematic direction of their studies, is of greater good to the department than the more or less intermittent work of anyone who selects to pay the fee, and in future criticism will be confined to the work of persons living in New York City who in consideration of free tuition are willing to work under the direction of the writer.

We believe that the department will benefit by the change, since we shall have constantly under instruction pupils of all grades of advancement and, so far as possible, of various grades of intelligence.

The scripts already in hand will be taken care of as time permits, unless the writers get tired of waiting and ask for their return. We are endeavoring to find some competent person with greater leisure to take up this work.

That League

Because the Photoplay Authors' League has been founded by some of the best minds in the business, and because, on the strength of those names, the writers are tempted to join the League, we once more give space to the matter in this department with the promise that the League will not again be permitted to crowd out the usual copy.

We have received from Marc Edmund Jones, secretary of the league, a letter in which he suggests that we are not a "benign critic" to be able to look forward into the future and declare the future of the League. The gist of this letter may be seen from the reply here printed. He says that it is the purpose of the league to make the manufacturers honorary members, "obtaining contributions from them as we do so." Somehow that does not sound nicely, but we do not believe that Jones means what this sounds like. We do not believe that the League will do the slightest practical good. We give our reasons in the letter here given. This is the expression of opinion of only one man and is given for what it is worth.

We quote this paragraph from Mr. ones' letter:

> Going back to business, you ask what we expect to give for $10.00 a year. As you say, we only expect to give a membership card. It is not what the League gives to its members, but what the members give to the League which merely represents them in advancing their interests as a whole—the photoplay author's profession at large. In the matter of copyright that is one of the least things which the League can and will do. Its principal work is to knit together the photoplay field as a whole; to accelerate its progress as a whole, and to this end we expect to take in manufacturers themselves as honorary members, obtaining contributions from them as we do so. As stated in its purposes, the League will not take an arbitrary stand with manufacturers, and there will not be any White-Rats' strike or anything of that kind. Your attitude that the majority of the membership of the League will develop more faulty judgment than that demonstrated by the organizers shows a lamentable lack of faith in the photoplay authors of the country. The fact that you believe that the majority of the photoplay authors are not capable of handling their own interests is a bureaucratic stand which would unfit anyone beloved and trusted than yourself as the conductor of a photoplay writers' column. Heaven knows we all like you well enough, but we wish "thunder" you would come down to earth in this particular matter.

Yours of March 27th to hand. Since you write me on the letter head of the League and since you make no request to the contrary I am going to make my reply to you for the paper, too. You know how I dislike the sight of typewriter.

I called that league "of yours," because it was evidently started by the de Ruth office and because you told me that your attorneys were [illegible] your league to recognize. You are largely responsible for it, if not the inventor.

I am not "born in dignity," but I've lived for two years and I've seen these things come and go in other lines and in this. I know, before it happens, what the answer is. For twenty-three years I have been playing the game, nicely and fairly, and in that time I have never had a story stolen, I have never had a row with an editor but once and then because he was slow with a check, and I have never had much trouble in being an "inside" writer in fiction as well as in photoplay, because I could and did deliver the goods, promptly and in reasonably good form. In other words, I have never, in nearly a quarter of a century, had to put up a yelp for help. I have always been able to fight my own battles and most of these [illegible] affair in Mexico resemble real warfare.

On the other hand, I have seen the White Rats rise and fall once and fall all by a second time. I have seen a lot of little authors' leagues go bong. I have seen one photoplay league go into the helper with never a tear save [illegible] the part of those who parted with a hardly won sum, and never, not even once, have I seen one of these things win a real victory, nor even anything approximating a victory. On the other hand, I have seen a lot of [illegible] done and I have personally, by orders from my employers, sent back the fiction work of members of a certain league on the proposition that the league must be composed of people whose work was not worth while. Most of the scripts I read through curiosity bore out the statement.

As I have said, I believe that all of you founders are well meaning and of good faith, but as I have also said, I cannot see that you can make good. Until you can convince me that you can do ten dollars' worth of good to each and every contributor to your society, I shall hold the position I do. You can't get copyright and you have backed down on that. You can't make editors give your members the preference save by doing better work than others do, and you do not need a league in order to do that. You say it is what the members give the league. What do they give the league other than their annual dues? You can't knit together the photoplay writers any more than you can knit together any other body of men. The brotherhood idea is good on paper, but are you going to give up the sale of a script because to do so will help a weaker brother make a sale in your place?

It seems to me that the outside idea of the league is best illustrated by an inquiry I received the other day from a writer who wanted to know if Griffith would hear her write her work if she joined the league.

Will he?

The league is a chance for the boobs to mix up with the well-known people by making them see that is about all you give and I do not see that it is worth the money.

As to the advantage of the general membership. Being more or less of an anarchist yourself and not being very far beyond the time you used to curse when you hit a slump and did not sell for several weeks, you do not realize that most of the people who will join your league will be the soreheads because the others do not need them. And if you think that the original membership can hold the sorcheads in check when all have equal vote, wait and see. The Board of Control can't control and the members will use the boots to the manufacturers long before they grow boots and just for that you'll all have to get off.

Lincoln freed the slaves in 1862 and down South they still have to lynch a darkey now and then to remind the world that in freeing the slaves it was not intended that they should be lynched over the rest of the nation. We do not mean to suggest that authors are the slaves of the manufacturers, but to point out that power newly acquired, or the sense of power will inevitably lead to trouble.

There is not a thing you claim to do that you, individually, have not done or are not able to do individually. At the Ed-Au recently Mrs. Brandon told me that I needed a keeper, because I did not think the club should put out a seal that placed on scripts would bring us more money. She pays about $20 a reel for Eclair scripts and I was just then dickering to be raised from $25 to $35 for half-reel scripts. Who do you think needs the manager? If you can deliver the goods you can, if you work nicely and without the use of a brass band, get the price.

And now for a personal point. You say I have put myself in bad unnecessarily with a number of people. Even so. I regret the fact. You suggest that I have responsibility in that I may guide my readers. Even so. It is that sense of responsibility that leads me to warn my readers against the league, even though it is composed mainly of those who have been my personal friends. I am gambling with a well-paid job on my belief that my knowledge of affairs is steering me (and the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD) right in this matter. Perhaps I will lose and get fired from the paper. Perhaps I shall have to thank you who have sought to turn me from my evil ways, but I am honestly and firmly convinced that the Photoplay Authors' League is an evil thing, though conceived in righteousness, and so long as I have a voice I shall say so and seek to give those who look to me for advice the best advice I can and this, at present, is that they keep out of the Photoplay Authors' League and avoid being marked down as one of the losers.

I am strong for anything that makes for the betterment of the business, that gives the helping hand to the struggling and the word of cheer to the young, but the club and the league are not the helping hand. They are not the word of cheer and you cannot, by writing on the lines you do, help either yourselves or the lesser brothers.

I am not sore, and there is nothing I would more gladly welcome than something that would benefit the struggling writer and help him come into his own, but what you offer, what you can possibly offer is not the remedy. Get some organization that will make the writer realize that only through hard work and not through combination or legal enactment is success possible, and I'm with you hide and hair, or at least the little hair I have, but get a society that makes authors read and not interest if you want to get up in the gallery and give three cheers.

I've taken a lot of time to tell you all this, because it is the last time I shall have anything to say in the matter, and I am going to print this in detail, because it is the last time I shall print anything about the league until the time comes to say, "I've told you so before." And saying "I told you so," is one of my little diversions that has been in use times past.

TO CALIFORNIA, PLEASE——

Through the ambiguous wording of the item sent in, it was announced that scripts for Beauty films should be sent to Chicago. R. R. Nehls advises us that all American Beauty scripts should be sent to the company at Santa Barbara, California.

Why?

Mrs. Brandon wants to know why it is that women are most generally the authors of the most impossible immoral pictures. We don't know. We know that it is not a peculiarity of the photoplay business. It is the case in fiction writing.
